Nicholas County Soil Conservation news

by Willmer Hilstomb
It is time to begin planning for food for the wildlife on your farm for next winter. Although this winter is not so past, most farmers are making plans for their 1972 crops.
Many farmers are making plans to plant some extra grain to be left in the field for the wildlife. Most of the grains are very valuable as wildlife foods. Corn is the real important and others that are important are wheat, rye, soy beans, millet, and grain sorghum. Corn is perhaps one of the most popular and beneficial for the largest number of wildlife. Most of the songbirds and all the game birds can and will eat corn. They can eat the grains of corn whole or peck them to small pieces. Numerous animals that are hunted, trapped or just watched for enjoyment can eat corn. Some of the known animals to eat corn after it has matured are deer, racoon, fox, groundhog, rabbit, squirrel, opossum, ducks and geese.
There are two popular ways that farmers use corn. One is to plant a small area where it will not be grazed or bothered by livestock. This type of area may be an old corner or a few rows along a field used for hay or other row crop. These fit in best when they are adjacent to a wooded or brushy area that gives cover to the wildlife. The other popular method of supplying grain is to leave a few rows or parts of rows at the ends or corners of fields when harvesting the grain. Some of the corn should be broken over by running the tractor over it so it will be easily gotten by the wild-

"Would I buy another electrically heated mobile home?"

I certainly would!

Mr. Cox agrees with his wife that the very nature of mobile home living — compactness and convenience, cleanliness and comfort without a lot of fuss — makes electric heat practically a must. And not only is the cost reasonable — to convert or buy a standard electrically heated mobile home — but the trouble-free operation means many maintenance dollars.
Like Mr. Cox, nine out of ten families who enjoy electrically heated mobile homes would buy another.
