Outdoor Lore

By Nevile Shackelford - University of Kentucky College of Agriculture

One of the most melancholy encounters one can have in the outdoors is to see a one-eyed old folk dead off until no one was left to carry on.

When the last flames flickered on the hearths, the deserted farm houses soon fell into ruins of sagging, leaning roofs and boarded gables.

Contemplating one of these old abandoned homesteads, one fan would roll back time and bring life and order more to the deserted place.

Knowing, however, of the struggle and the pain and the hardships one endured on some of these places, the thought crowds through the consciousness that perhaps all for the best.

These farmsteads fell victim to the machine age and technology, which is nothing more than a series of interlocking systems that get things done with less and less need for human labor.

Agree Or Not

I Say What I Think by S. C. VanCuron

FRANKFORT—The number of proposed subjects to be covered in the special session of the general assembly to be called some time in June seems to be growing every week.

First on Gov. Wendell Ford's list of reasons for calling the special session is to bring that registration registration in line with the Constitution.

Never daunted

Once upon a time a small-town businessman went back and closed his doors. That was in '31. Trying to get out of the depression, he gave up.

Two years later he failed again, but he got back on his feet. He was back in business in '33. Two years later he failed again, but he got back on his feet.

How much wood would a woodpecker peck if a woodpecker could peck wood?

The bird kept digging away at the woodwork until he got out and the first thing he did was to peck his own head. And he did make a hole in a dive-bomber attack.

Women don't like woodpeckers. That is probably because they hear so much in their homes. Like the way they're back, they're back, they're back.
