Mr. Goomber to address W.S.C.S. Circle

James K. Goomber, an exchange teacher from Indore, India, will speak at the W.S.C.S. Evening Circle, Monday evening, June 5, at the Methodist Educational Building.

Mr. Goomber has spent the past year teaching Math at our local high school. During his stay in Nicholas county, he has spoken to many social and educational groups, and given valuable services to our community in many other ways.

He will be returning to India by way of New York, London and Bombay, India, on Saturday, May 27, 1972 at the Bourbon County Hospital.

Hostesses for the evening will be Mrs. David Booth and Mrs. Luther Holler.

Upon occasions where words fail or seem inadequate, roses are depended upon to get the message across. Young men give them to their sweethearts; brides carry them at weddings; brides being cheered by their presence in sick rooms, and under the benevolent blanket of these lovely flowers, the beloved dead are often interred.

An insignia of joy and sorrow, and of love and war, the rose has been more closely identified with the progress of western civilization than any other plant.

One of the first things pioneer men did when settling down in a new land was to plant rosebushes by the door of their homes. The rose represented the hope of permanency and was a nostalgic link with the past.

As our civilization grew older and more time was available for improvement of the homes, rose gardens became more common.

Well-planned rose gardens became sanctuaries where man took their three bodies and troubled hearts to rest. It has been said that when you see someone working with roses, caring for them, and loving them, you need have no doubt about the goodness of their character. Whether or not this is so may be a matter for debate, but one thing is sure; those who contribute to the propagation, development, and enjoyment of the rose are adding much to the joys of life and to the beauty of the earth.

A member of the plant family which includes the peach, pear, apple, cherry, strawberry, and several other fruits both wild and domesticated, the rose is all but universally loved. In fact, it is in world history and literature are mentioned. In the wild rose is the loveliest flower of the fields and country roadside, and at least four states have designated it as a state flower. Because of its wide appeal, it could be the leading candidate for the title of national flower.

The rose grows wild in practically all temperate regions but according to plant historians, was first cultivated in Persia and Northern India.

In ancient Persian legend, it is held that the rose was once a bud of magnificent fragrance that grew in the garden of a king. Standing among thousands of beautiful blossoms, it was too timid to unfold its petals. Before the dawn of one night when, attracted by its lovely smell, a nightingale alighted upon the rose and burst into song. In response to this entrancing music, the bud unfolded revealing a wondrous beauty to the world.

This stinging and blooming went on for some time until, finally irritated by the nightly serenade, other birds in the garden complained to the king that the nightingale was depriving them of their sleep. Called before the throne to give an account of himself, the nocturnal singer took the king into the garden and began singing. As the first sweet notes of the bird's song sounded upon the stillness of the night, the rosebud unfolded in radiant bloom.

Impressed by the beauty of the flower, the king immediately forgot about the complaints and decreed that the nightingale might visit and sing each night in the garden provided the rose would agree to always remain open for others to see and enjoy its beauty.

Thanks to modern horticultural research, there are now many varieties of roses of beautiful bloom. Although they do have special needs, they are comparatively easy to grow and are among the most colorful garden flowers. Any one interested in growing them will benefit by asking his county Extension agent for the Home and Garden Bulletin 25, "Roses for the Home."

Memorial Day offered various forms of recreation and pleasure
Here Chef and Mrs. Charles Cox prepare a cook-out of fish and tennis puddings with the assistance of Mrs. Emery Clark for about 12 friends. There may be easier ways of cooking, but not much more fun (not does it taste as good as cooking on an open fire at Lake Carlisle.—Mercury picture)
