SS manager tours Illinois hybrid corn seed plant

Frank Vaughan, manager of Southern States Carlisle Co-operative, was among a group of seedling tour members who recently returned from a two-day tour of the Illinois Hybrid Seed Co. hybrid seed corn plant at Muncie, Ill. The tour was held to familiarize the managers with the facility and the processing methods used by the cooperative. Managers accompanied Vaughan were:

Blond, blue-eyed Monty learns about nature and how to play

WEST LIBERTY, Ky.—He is four years old, blond and blue-eyed. "He's a pretty child," said Mrs. Louise Pergum, social service supervisor of Community Services in the Morehead office of the Kentucky Department of Child Welfare.

Monty is lovable, dear and playful—about 12 times every day sits in small frame strollers, jerks and twirls in the exhortations of epilepsies. There's a time when the convulsions came one after the other.

Each time this happened, Monty's young mother also was not pleased by the traumatic experience. She also had her housework to do, and she had to care for her family to care for—and there had never been enough money for any of it.

Monty's real name—was given by the University of Kentucky Medical Center, Lexington, Community Services Program.

"Our program is to assist parents offered, 'is to keep children in their homes.'" Her office workers and urged her to take Monty to the hospital for a complete physical examination.

Mrs. Pergum and her workers found that a rugged section of the five-county area in a home where he was loved, but where the family's income was about $800 a year.

His father worked at odd jobs in the neighborhood and county, while his mother's willing hands kept the family together.

"What we referred to the family," the supervisor said, "we found the mother frustrated in her efforts to help her son, and worn out with her around-the-clock watchfulness."

Many persons think the Department of Child Welfare's job is to supervise state facilities for rehabilitating delinquent youths, but the overall program of service is so vast that Commissioner Evans Tracy believes his department touches almost every life in the commonwealth.

"If each individual is not directly affected," Tracy said, "anyone who thinks he has no involvement in any part of the far-reaching responsibility of child welfare should look around him and see a hard-to-place child who needs a better home, a child guided by looking desperately for an adult with whom to talk over his problems of a harrassed youth, capable and willing, who needs a job."

Homemaking services are a part of the help that emanates from the Morehead office and other similar offices throughout the state. Mrs. Pergum explains that staff homemakers are regular employees of the department who, together with contractual homemakers, will go into homes that fit the low-income guidelines and give 24-hour service when necessary. This includes housework, teaching better child care, doing laundry or shopping for family.

In Monty's case, the homemaker played and worked with him. She took along books and read to him. At different times during the tour were selected from the major seed corn producing area of the cooperative's operating territory. Southern States Co-operative serves farmer-members in Virginia, Maryland, Delaware, West Virginia and Kentucky.

James E. Coleman, manager of seed merchandising for the cooperative, was in charge of the tour.

In addition to seeing fields of hybrids being harvested, the group had seen the corn being graded and processed in the plant. (The cooperative has about 2,000 acres of hybrid seed corn near the plant.)

Assisting with the tour were Harold Spencer, and Walter Heas, manager and assistant manager, respectively, of the hybrid corn facility.

The group also heard Dr. Dave Avey of Farmers Board Research of Lafayette, Ind., discuss "New Improved Hybrids for Today-Tomorrow." Southern States Co-operative is one of 11 cooperatives which own Farmers Forage Research.
