False hope raised by erroneous rumors

The Veterans Administration reported today that it is receiving a deluge of telephone calls and applications from World War II veterans who have been cruelly deceived by an erroneous rumor of a special dividend from their World War II insurance.
VA officials are concerned that many World War II veterans may have the false hope they are in for an insurance special dividend windfall.
They are not. The hoax that has swept the nation usually involves accumulated dividends that are supposed to have piled upon World War II National Service Life Insurance policies—even if no premiums have been paid on the policies since the end of the war.
The stories may stem from an action taken in 1946 when payment of a special dividend on these same policies was authorized.
These dividends were derived from premium overpayments because of a lower than anticipated casualty rate during the war. However, all payments of these special dividends ended years ago.
