REPORTS TO THE PEOPLE OF KENTUCKY

Senator Dee Huddleston

One issue I have received a great deal of mail about is the administration's proposal to provide aid to North Vietnam. While no specific figure has been used by administration spokesmen, the amount is generally thought to be in the neighborhood of $2 billion.

I am opposed to providing aid for North Vietnam at this time. To do so, in my opinion, would be an improper use of the money—especially at a time when we have so many unresolved problems here in this country and so many projects that need help from the federal government.

Based on my mail, I have no doubt that this is the view of an overwhelming majority of Kentuckians, as well as all Americans. It is also the view of most members of Congress. Just the other day the Senate voted 88-3 for an amendment to prohibit any aid to North Vietnam unless specifically approved by the Congress. This amendment was designed to prevent the administration from providing aid out of some contingency fund or existing agency budget without gaining explicit approval of Congress.

Those who argue in favor of aid to North Vietnam usually point out that we helped Japan, Italy and Germany after World War II as an act of humanitarianism. However, I do not believe the situation in Vietnam is analogous to what occurred after World War II. After the Second World War, our enemies were defeated, their countries occupied by foreign troops, their governments dismantled, and their war-making potential destroyed. And they had no allies strong enough to provide them with needed financial assistance.

None of those conditions applies to North Vietnam. Rather than being defeated, they are claiming victory; their communist government remains intact; and their warmaking capability is just as potent as it ever was. Indeed, most analysts believe North Vietnam will eventually make another major attempt to gain control of the south.

Besides, North Vietnam has in Russia and China two very strong allies with healthy economies. Russia and China supported North Vietnam throughout the war and there is no reason to believe they cannot do so now.

So unless there has been some kind of secret agreement between our country and North Vietnam whereby the end of the war was made contingent on such aid, I do not believe Congress will go along with it. Every day the administration announces cutbacks and terminations of programs providing education funds, water and sewer facilities, rural environmental assistance, etc. To provide huge sums of money to our former enemies—who still proclaim their intention of dominating South Vietnam—while our own programs are being cut would be a travesty.

MAGICWORD by JULIE QUART

HOW TO PLAY: Read the list of words. Look at the puzzle. You'll find these words in all directions — horizontally, vertically, diagonally, backwards. Draw a circle around each letter of a word found in the puzzle then strike it off list. Circling it will show a letter has been used but will leave it visible should it also form part of another word. Find the big words first. When letters of all listed words are circled, you'll have the given number of letters left over. They'll spell out your MAGICWORD.

SUSTAINING THE VETOES

For the first time in many years the United States has a president who is determined to hold down the cost of government and is willing to employ his veto power to that end. This means the American people have a chance—a rare chance—of getting a long overdue reduction in government expenditures. But if they want a return to an economical style in government, they will have to give the President their support and advise their representatives in Congress that they want meaningful curbs on federal spending.

In the last decade, federal spending on domestic programs rose by some 220 per cent. The Federal government got into the habit of throwing money at every kind of problem, despite the fact that huge giveaways compound rather than solve problems. Gradually, many citizens have come to understand this and thus support effective restraints on federal spending. The administration's move to dismantle the Office of Economic Opportunity (OEO) has produced howls of protest from liberal commentators but hasn't evoked any adverse grassroots reaction. On the contrary, great numbers of citizens apparently regard the OEO as a prime example of governmental waste.

The facts are all on President Nixon's side in his effort to curb governmental spending. In 1959, all levels of government absorbed 24 per cent of the nation's income. Today, the figure is nearly 40 per cent. But for the presidential veto8, this percentage would be hiked sharply in the next year.

The time has come to halt uncontrolled government spending, but President Nixon has difficulty applying the brakes. In the U.S. Senate, fiscal responsibility is something that the liberal bloc doesn't even try to understand. And in the House of Representatives many members are under heavy pressure from political sources to override the President's veto of spending bills. It is tremendously important, therefore, that citizens who are mindful of the spending crisis take the time to write to their congressmen and let them know that the people back home are saying "no" to massive federal spending.

President Nixon, for his part, needs to explain in greater detail the rationale for checking federal spending. Not only is there an immediate spending crisis, but the fundamental design of our federal system requires that Washington stop trying to solve every problem.

Dr. William A. Stanmeyer, writing in the current issue of Modern Age, recently addressed himself to this matter, citing the need to minimize unnecessary burdens on the federal government. He stressed the importance of the federal government concentrating on primary functions—"providing for the common defense, promoting domestic tranquillity, regulating the economy and money supply." He pointed out that private citizens and the 50 states can deal most effectively with "education, health, old age care, welfare, housing." It is in these areas that the federal approach has been so wasteful and ineffective.

Instead of creating costly new federal programs for the elderly, for example, the Congress can change the tax code to encourage individuals to provide humane care for old people. "The present code," Dr. Stanmeyer notes, "discourages home care for one's own parents, if two adult children share the burden of caring for their elderly parents, the one providing the home, the other over 5lper cent of the financial support, neither can take a deduction, less a credit." Yet Congress can easily remedy this situation without creating new programs or adding to the size of the federal bureaucracy.

There are innumerable things Congress can do to help the American people—all without hiking the cost of government. In the housing field, Congress can alter the tax code so as to encourage people to rehabilitate older dwellings and apartments—a major need at a time when the cost of new housing has risen sharply. Congress also can give improved tax deductions for voluntary health insurance, thereby making possible greater use of the efficiently organized private insurance system. Overall, the need is for Congres to set forth policies and then encourage voluntary associations, businesses and private individuals to implement those policies, encouraging them to do so by means of tax incentives. The same approach should be utilized in federal-state relations. The federal government shouldn't involve itself in an activity where the states have the capacity for action.
