Fresh meats dated as aid to shoppers
Louisville—Kroger is making it easier for supermarket shoppers to see for themselves the freshness of meat and produce before they buy.

The 33 supermarkets in this area now have easily read dates such as Aug. 20 on fresh meats as an aid to shoppers. Operating in 100 Kentucky and 100 other states has begun and will be completed as quickly as the necessary equipment can be obtained.

The date is a freshness date which indicates the final day on which the product may be sold so that it will remain at fresh quality for an average usage period (or longer) in the customer's home after purchase.

Louisville district vice president James A. LeRoy said the broadening of the company's open dating to cover meats and produce represents the second phase of the program. The first phase, which covered some 1200 Kroger brand foods, such as milk, eggs and bread, now is completed. When meats and produce are open-dated, virtually all perishable products in Kroger stores will be freshness-dated.

"Kroger believes that more informed shoppers are better and more satisfied shoppers," Mr. LeRoy said. "We have confidence in the freshness of our products. That's why we can let shoppers see for themselves how fresh they are, and why we can guarantee products on a money-back basis."

Mr. LeRoy explained that Kroger has always used dates to indicate proper rotation, but that these dates formerly were codes so that only store personnel could read them.

Although Kroger has open-dated certain products such as refrigerated biscuits (or coffee) for many years, the large-scale switchover to open dates began a year ago following a favorable test of open dating in Kroger stores in two Ohio cities. The test was conducted in cooperation with the United States Department of Agriculture and Consumer Research Institute. Use of the freshness or final sales date was chosen as most helpful to consumers.

Owen resigns post
Charles L. Owen, executive director of the Kentucky Crime Commission, is resigning as of Sept. 30, 1973 to enter private law practice as announced in a recent letter to Gov. Wendell Ford.

Owen, who has been executive director since July 1, 1971, praised the "partnership" enjoyed by the Kentucky Crime Commission with three successive governors and termed this relationship "exemplary."

The commission was formed under former Governor Edward Breathitt. Owen has been its only director.

In his letter of resignation, Owen, who was a United States attorney in Washington, D.C., before taking the Crime Commission post, listed some of the commission's accomplishments.

Among the list of 18 items, he mentioned the creation of the nation's first salary incentive program resulting in minimum training, education and operations standards for local police; a state's first public defender and paid bail system for indigents.

Owen, who was instrumental in the creation of the Crime Commission, has received national recognition for his service, including two terms as chairman of the National Conference State Crime Commission Directors.

Senator explains new election bill

Federal office seekers in Kentucky next year may be operating under spending limitations including an approximate $215,000 ceiling for Senatorial primary elections and a limit of about $20,000 for general election bids.

Senator Marlow Cook pointed out July 30 following passage of the Federal Election Campaign Act.

Those limits, based on state voting-age population, are only a slice of the effects that act would have on Kentuckians, Senator Cook remarked in a review of the provisions of the bill.

In his explanation, Cook summed up the major provisions of the bill as placing an absolute limit on the amount any individual could contribute to political campaigns, imposing ceilings on expenditures for such races and setting a general election. A limit of $25,000 would be set for amounts an individual could contribute in a single year for all campaigns for federal office, Cook said.

The Senator stated that the bill, which would amend the 1971 campaign financing disclosure law, carries potential penalties of up to $25,000 in fines or prison terms of up to five years for violations.

However, he stated, the measure applies only to the financial aspects of campaigns and not get into the conduct or moral aspects of political races.

While commenting on what the bill would mean for Kentucky, Cook warned that still to be voted in the U.S. House of Representatives. He added he did not know how far it would get in that chamber because all House members face re-election every two years while Kentucky's Charles L. Owen stands for re-election at any one time.

Final Senate vote on the reform act, which Cook was the floor manager helping direct debate, was 82-8.

He enacted into law, the bill would mean candidates would have to spend less than the amounts paid out in recent election bids in Kentucky-Cook said.

Last year, he said Kentucky Registry of Election Finance statistics show, one-third of the candidates spent about $65,000 on the general election race, while another spent almost $90,000. Under the new law, if it is enacted, during the 1974 campaign such candidates would be limited to spending only about $25,000 in the general election, according to population figures presently available, and only approximately $215,000 for a primary.

Candidates for House seats would be covered by varying limitations, based on the voting-age populations of Congressional districts, Cook added.

Those limits are based on expenditure levels of 10 cents per eligible voter for primary races and 15 cents per eligible voter in general elections, he explained.

The bill also would place a $1,000 limitation on individual contributions to a candidate but would raise this to $9,000 should a candidate face a primary runoff and a general election. A limit of $25,000 would be set for amounts an individual could contribute in a single year for all campaigns for federal office, Cook said.

The Senator stated that the bill, which would amend the 1971 campaign financing disclosure law, carries potential penalties of up to $25,000 in fines or prison terms of up to five years for violations.
