Dr. Bladen uncovers interesting Kentucky facts

The world's first locomotive was built in Lexington in 1828.
Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, has Lexington's old street car system, for which the city was never paid, because Mussolini invaded that country about the time the cars arrived there.
Kentucky has more navigable waters than any state except Alaska. In 1775, Daniel Boone asked the old Transylvania Company, which later became the Kentucky Legislature, for permission to bring in new breeding horses—thus founding the Kentucky breeding industry.
These are a sample of facts which an expert in Kentucky geography, Dr. W.A. Bladen of the University of Kentucky Department of Geography, likes to uncover about Kentucky to make his classes more interesting.

Some Eastern Kentucky towns, like Jenkins and Meloberts in Letcher county and Shelburn in Harlan county, were named for coal company executives. Other town names were formed from the first letters of coal seams in the first letters of coal companies, like Vico in Perry county, (Virginia Iron and Coke Company) and Sevo in Letcher county, (South East Coal Company).
Other Eastern Kentucky towns were named for their distance from the county seat, as Four Miles in Bell county, because it is four miles from Pigeonville. In Western Kentucky, New Madrid Road in Fulton county is cut off by six miles from the remainder of the county. Residents of New Madrid Road can either take the 25-mile land route through Tennessee to reach Fulton county again, or they can take the short cut, by twice crossing the Mississippi River.

Dr. Bladen and other geographers, most of them at U.K., have compiled a new book, "Kentucky, A Regional Geography," which puts together the class notes of professors who teach Kentucky geography.
Published by Kendall-Hunt, Dubuque, Iowa, the book will be reissued in expanded form in about a year, Dr. Bladen said.
Edited by Dr. P.P. Karam, chairman of the U.K. Department of Geography, the volume contains selections by Dr. Bladen on Eastern Kentucky; the patterns time, Milford lived with Richmond to be the county seat. Richmond was, and Milford now is a Richmond mine.

Dr. Bladen said he knows many people in Eastern Kentucky and has never living there. "I have empathy with these people. I know that area the best," he said.
