The City of Carlisle is in the process of blacktopping several of the city streets and alleys. We think the Council and Mayor Bill Power should be commended for accomplishing the much needed improvements.

The streets which were in the worst shape are either already finished or in the process of being blacktopped. Several alleys have been partially or completely blacktopped, and several other streets will be paved.

Growing a steak

Price ceilings won't change the economics of producing a steer for market. In the long run, costs of production, processing and distribution still have to be covered by the consumer.

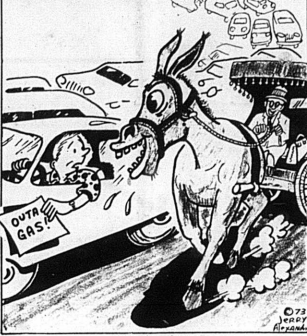

A brief pamphlet put out by the Beef Industry Council of the National Live Stock and Meat Board explains the process of raising and marketing a beef animal. It is pointed out that "beef supply is not accident. Actually it's thousands of miles and months from conception to consumption."

A 1,000 pound steer yields only about 45 pounds of retail beef cuts. Most of these cuts are things such as steaks which people like to eat.

It takes nine months for a cow to produce a calf. Then there is another six or seven months with the cow and calf on pasture, plus 300 pounds of grain, 200 pounds of protein and 10,000 pounds of protein and water to bring the calf to weaning age of 450 pounds. After this there are another 12 to 18 months in the feedlot, 2,000 pounds more of grain, 300 pounds of protein supplement and 2,000 pounds of hay, silage and pasture before the one-time calf is ready for sale to the packer at a weight of 1,000 pounds or thereabouts. And this is not all.

Editor's Note: I have just returned from a two-week stay in the San Joaquin Valley of California where I investigated the migrant farm worker problem.

DELANO, Calif.—It's all right to let your heart bleed for the migrant farm workers who harvest your fruit and vegetables in California, but not for the false promises put out by Cesar Chavez, self-styled leader of the United Farm Workers Union.

It is also appropriate to let your heart bleed for yourself as you visit the vegetable counter in your super market.

During last year's presidential election tax reform was one of the major issues. However, since the campaign was over, tax reform was more or less "put on the shelf."
