What to do in March?

If the job wasn't done last fall, the month of March is high time to start preparing the garden soil for the spring planting.
Good soil preparation, according to Hubert Davis, Extension specialist in horticulture at the University of Kentucky College of Agriculture, is of vital importance to a good crop of vegetables and it begins with deep plowing—approximately 19 to 21 inches deep.
However, if the garden hasn't been plowed to that depth before, Davis says to approach this depth gradually, going about an inch deeper a year until the soil has been plowed. Davis further pointed out that a yearly disked or harrowed until a fine, firm seedbed has been reached. Correct seedbed preparation not only helps plants to grow, but also eliminates much of the hard work of cultivation after the crop is planted.

Depending upon the enthusiasm of the gardener and the condition of the weather, several vegetables can be planted or the seed sown in March. Starting around the middle of the month, cabbage, kale, lettuce, mustard, onion, peas, potatoes, radishes, and turnips can be put in the ground. In earlier years of gardening, it was almost a religion to plant potatoes during the "dark nights of March." It was generally believed that, if planted during the dark of the moon, potatoes would grow deep in the ground and produce a better crop.

Davis makes no comment one way or another on this rule but does advise getting potatoes in the ground around Mar. 15. He also suggests that gardeners pick up a copy of the UK Cooperative Extension Service circular 339, entitled "Home Gardening." This publication, which is filled with much good information on gardening and raising vegetables, is available at most county Extension offices. It can also be ordered directly from the Bulletin Room, UK Experiment Station Building, Lexington, Ky. 40506.

March is a good time to move or transplant shrubs. Do this just as soon as the ground thaws out or can be easily worked. In transplanting balled stock, see that the buds are several inches underground. This will prevent suckers from springing up from the footer plant. March provides about the last opportunity until next fall to transplant grapes, evergreens, dormant roses, and reduce easily, and with the best chance of success.

Extended area phone service

The candidate said that the next step is to set up a citizens' telephone committee in each of the counties. Ward said he would work with the local committees and would make the resources of his office available to expedite the work of the committees. Ward held similar committees representing Woodford and Jessamine counties beginning in 1968. Extended area service to be provided between exchanges served by different telephone companies.

The work of these committees resulted in a speeded up plan for extended area service for Woodford-Fayette and Jessamine-Fayette which was inaugurated Dec. 28, 1972. The increased telephone rates in Woodford and Jessamine are less than a dollar for residential subscribers and some $4.00 per month for business subscribers. This is resulting in a savings of tens of thousands of dollars to the residents of these counties, Ward pointed out.

Ward promised fairness and reasonableness to the telephone companies and said that this drive would be conducted in a positive and
