SUSAN DUFF'S CALORIE COUNTDOWN

NEW FINDINGS ON DIET PILLS AND WEIGHT LOSS

Amphetamine, the principal ingredient in diet pills, was first synthesized in 1927. Shortly thereafter, scientists and researchers learned that this drug had the remarkable faculty of diminishing human appetite. Doctors, who had long been frustrated by the medical problem of treating obesity, were understandably enthusiastic about the new drug and amphetamine diet pills became the primary "cure" for the overweight.

Now some 45 years later, we have had some second thoughts on the matter: the government has had to curtail amphetamine manufacture sharply due to new discoveries about these pills; clinical studies have revealed that weight losses caused by amphetamine usage are minimal and, at best, temporary; and the Justice Department has recently categorized all amphetamines and their derivatives under the same classification as opium, cocaine and methadone. In other words, amphetamine diet pills are actually considered dangerous drugs and, in fact, they are subject to widespread abuse because they have been found to be so highly addictive.

Now, overly zealous dieters all too seldom take warning from such new findings. Overweight people sometimes are so determined to shed poundage, they will do anything to force the scales down. They refuse to believe that taking diet pills can be the most dangerous way possible of attempting to reduce. Every striving and frustrated calorie counter can sympathize with such desperation but, let's face it, boring and grueling as it may seem, a steady plan of dietary control is the only sensible way to lose weight and keep it off.

Okay, what if you're not the "sensible dieter" type? What if you think that anything that helps you lose weight is worth a try? In that case, all the warnings and lectures in the world won't dissuade you from using amphetamine pills. Instead, you'd better take a look at the facts.

A panel of professional consultants (medical and pharmacological scientists) was hired by the government to test the effectiveness of amphetamines in reducing weight. From the tremendous amounts of data they compiled, this panel came to some very interesting conclusions as to just how effective the so-called "diet" pills really are: 1) It was discovered that short-term usage of amphetamine pills produced weight loss results of merely a fraction of a pound per week. (A wise dieter can lose more than a pound a week simply by making slight sacrifices in caloric intake!) 2) The total capacity of amphetamines to reduce weight over longer periods of time was found to be so minimal and so temporary that the scientists called the pills "clinically trivial" for effective weight loss. Given that diet pills have many distressing side effects, the fact that these pills don't even work should convince even the most reckless dieter that amphetamines are no panacea for the hopeful weight watcher.

Non-amphetamine pills are now being developed to help the weary dieter overcome a large appetite and the most prominent of those now being tested is a drug called fenfluramine. But, regardless of what pharmacology comes up with to suppress our hunger pangs, every successful dieter realizes, in the final analysis, that dedicated willpower is the only real answer to steady, permanent weight control. Your own determination to be a slimmer, healthier and more attractive person is the most powerful fat-fighting "drug" there is. Why not stick with that.

Misue of eye makeup

How long have you had that eye shadow? How long have you had the eye liners? Do the containers have dust or dirt on them? Do you and your daughter use the same eye makeup?

The reason for these questions is simple, yet important to your health and possibly your sight. Many women suffer infection of the eyes from misuse of eye cosmetics. Many women carelessly contaminate their eye makeup.

Mascara, eye shadow or eye liners, misused, can and do lead to the growth of dangerous bacteria. When these infectious eye makeups are applied to areas around the eye, the cosmetics can cause infection and even blindness.

If you have any eye cosmetics in containers which you haven't used for several months, it would benefit your health, and the health of others, to discard them.

Regardless of where you store your containers, dust and dirt can collect in them and on them. When this is allowed to happen, the cosmetics can become contaminated. Check your container: if visible dust or dirt is present, wipe if off with a damp cloth.

Before you apply your eye makeup, wash your hands. Your hands may contain bacteria which can cause serious infection. Also, be certain that any instrument placed near your eyes is clean.

If any eye product causes irritation, immediately discontinue its use. If the irritation persists, see your doctor.

Many women use saliva as a means of wetting or thinning eye cosmetics. This can very easily lead to infection, since bacteria from the mouth may grow in the cosmetic.

Never use someone else's eye makeup or allow them to use yours. In one such instance, a girl used a friend's eye makeup and subsequently contracted a serious eye infection which almost blinded her.

If you have a consumer complaint or problem, you are invited to call the Consumer Hotline between 8:30 a.m. and 5:00 p.m., toll free, at 1-800-372-2960.

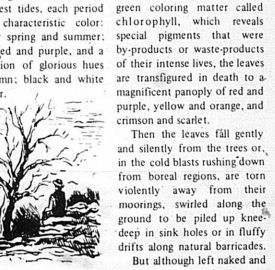
Outdoor Lore

By Nevyle Shackelford • University of Kentucky College of Agriculture

To walk in the woods in winter is to be reminded that tree life is analogous to the tides of the seas. Like these vast movements of water, it sets forth in a flood in spring, rises to its highwater mark in summer, and then ebbs away in autumn to the austerity of winter in a configuration of weathered trunks and barren twigs that trace graceful arabesques against a cold gray sky.

Recalling the rise and fall of these forest tides, each period has its characteristic color: green for spring and summer; orange, red and purple, and a combination of glorious hues for autumn; black and white for winter.



Throughout the spring and summer, trees lead intense lives. Hurrying to fulfill their destinies, there is an exuberance of bourgeoning leaf and growing stem; a burst of flowering and ripening into seed and, with the aid of the long hours of sunlight, the manufacturing and storing away of sugar and other more complex compounds without which no tree could long exist.

As the tide of autum begins to ebb away, the vitality of tree life is checked. The movement of the sap slows down and the leaves begin to fade. But before they die, they surrender back to the root and stem that bore them all the residue of their previous summer industry. In this gentle flow of sugar and other valuable materials from the dying leaf is the hope of another spring.

Now virtually dead, the leaves are as empty houses, dismantled but still beautiful. Due to the breaking up of the green coloring matter called chlorophyll, which reveals special pigments that were by-products or waste-products of their intense lives, the leaves are transfigured in death to a magnificent panoply of red and purple, yellow and orange, and crimson and scarlet.

Then the leaves fall gently and silently from the trees or, in the cold blasts rushing down from boreal regions, are torn violently away from their moorings, swirled along the ground to be piled up knee-deep in sink holes or in fluffy drifts along natural barricades.

But although left naked and lonely in the wind, the tree itself is not really impoverished by this loss of its mantle of leaves. Having served their purpose as a laboratory in which many vital substances were distilled, the battered and torn leaves still have another service to perform. There on the forest floor, mouldered by fungi, eaten and digested by earthworms, and further obliterated by bacteria, they provide the organic matter or vegetable mould in which are cradled seedlings and the life of another tide and another year.
