Hearing set for Bourbon, Scott to Fayette toll-free phone service

State Senator Tom Ward, Democrat of Versailles, said he has been advised by Richard D. Homan Jr., secretary of the Public Service Commission of Kentucky, that a hearing to consider the establishment of extended area telephone service is being held in the Commissioner's offices on the 24th Floor in the Capitol Plaza Tower in Frankfort. Senator Ward said that he had asked the Public Service Commission to consider the feasibility of extending the telephone service between Bourbon county and Fayette county, and of the toll-free service between Bourbon and Scott counties. He said that he had also asked the Public Service Commission to consider the feasibility of extending the telephone service between Bourbon and Scott counties. extended area (generally called " toll-free" service due to the heavy calling pattern between Bourbon and Scott counties) would consume one entire hearing. Senator Ward said that he had worked with local committees concerned about other matters, such as the improvement of telephone service through a multi-party system of getting area service, and the possibility of improved optical calling plans if extended area service did not become a reality. Ward said these matters would also be the subject of a second hearing which will be held in the next few months.

Kroger freezes 1100 prices until 1975

Kroger stores in this area are freezing prices on 1100 grocery items for 60 days as a part of a nationwide anti-inflation program announced recently by the supermarket company. The price freeze started Dec. 2 in the 70 stores in the Louisville area and will assure shoppers that no price increases will be made on these items throughout the holidays and extending into the New Year. In Feb. 1, 1975, according to William M. Grelich, Director of Retail Operations, of Kroger, who made the announcement at a news conference in Louisville recently, more than $9 million Kroger shoppers in 124 supermarkets in 26 states will benefit from the company-wide program. Grelich said the number of prices which will be frozen in the Louisville area covers a wide range of grocery products—basic, fundamental items and brands which are a regular part of the family's weekly supermarket purchases. Included are cereals, canned vegetables, canned juices, paper products, household items, pet foods, cheese, peanut butter, dry beans and frozen foods. Kroger is implementing the program in support of President Ford's call to "Who's Right Now" through union fair action. "We do not pretend that this move will solve the underlying causes of inflation," Grelich said. "It will provide relief and some real value for our shoppers. This action is a visible sign of our concern about high prices and inflation."

Blue "Kroger price freeze" shelf markers will prominently identify for shoppers the products on which no price increases will be made for the two-month period, no matter what happens in the market. Grelich said that Kroger has been concerned for some time, as have shoppers, about the inflationary spiral affecting everything consumers buy—with food prices in the spotlight. "Those of us on the other side of the counter share consumers' feelings of frustration and irritation," he said. "We don't like high prices any better than you do."

Strode's Station—one of roots of Clark County. Strode's Station, which has since passed from the scene, is one of the roots from which Clark County sprang. Little is known about the history of Strode's Station, but we do know however, that the area was first settled by a Virginia gentleman who came to Kentucky from Berkeley County, Va. in 1776. The same year the American colonist revolted from British rule.

Strode offered other pioneers in the area that was to become Clark county in 1775—the use of land at the station free of rent until the end of the Revolutionary War. By 1781 the station was firmly established in Clark county with 25 cabins having been constructed. On March 1, 1781 the station was assigned from military lands to the morning until the end of the Indian by a pair of British and Indians who killed Captain Patrick Donohoe, Jacob Spahr and nearly all of the stock. Strode and his family fled the scene and hid in the woods. Strode's Station was virtually unpopulated that day as a party had been sent to Booneborough to protect the fort there against a possible Indian attack. The cabin failed to materialize, the men returned home to find that their own station had been under siege.

We also have recorded an attack on the station in March, 1782 by a party of 25 Wyandottas. Records show it was served principally as an outpost for Booneborough, which was only 10 miles away. The men were killed and much of the sheep flock was slaughtered, but the Indians were able to do no damage even though they stayed in siege for 30 hours. There are only scattered incidents of Indian trouble at Strode's Station reported during the next several years. In 1792, the year that Kentucky joined the Union, Polly Donohoe and Rebecca Spahr were captured by a party of 44 red coat men of the Indian Families United in 1790, after the Battle of Fallen Timbers in which General Anthony Wayne routed the Indians from the Ohio-Kentucky area. Winchester had been settled during this time and hereafter a contest developed between the two settlements to see which would become the county seat of Clark county. The two settlements were only 10 miles apart. When the vote was finally cast, Winchester was made the county seat. Strode's Station was the county seat of Clark county for five years and five months and five days. Strode voted for Winchester because "he didn't want any more to think he would use his position for a private purpose." Strode owned the land on which the town would be located if his station were chosen the county seat. After the decision to make Winchester the county seat of Clark county, the pace of life at Strode's Station slackened considerably. Few references are found to the station after that and people gradually began to move to Winchester. On March 1, 1790 the cabinet maker at the station, Daniel

Money is expensive for you. For us. Expanding our facilities to meet the electrical needs of 300,000 customers costs money. $57 million last year. $61 million this year. And we have budgeted more than $100 million for next year... up from about 4 1/2% in 1965 to about 10% today. Our annual outlay for interest in 1966 was $271 million. Today it's $122 million. Vocational Ag class attends cattle show. By Mike Hillcock. Thursday, Nov. 21, the Vocational Agriculture II Class of 13 members traveled to the North American Livestock Show at the Louisville Exposition Center. While at the Exposition Center the members saw the National Fiedler Herd Show. They saw many exotic breeds of cattle, including Chianina, Norwegian Red, Pinagun, Shorthorn and Jersey. They also saw the exotic breeds were Angus, Hereford, Shorthorn, Charolais and many other breeds. There were plenty of exhibits at the show to look at also. There were exhibits of western clothing, artificial breeding kits and many other items. Some of the class members commented on the show. Here is what a few of the class members had to say: said Mark Evans, Cliff Shumate commented, "I thought it was very interesting cattle show and I enjoyed it very much."
