GHOSTS OF YORK

The sound of the hoofs are no more, Gone are the buffalo and deer; The low, rife and pioneer of yore, Are history now I fear.

The painted red skins who roamed the land, In search of food and prey; No longer are seen as they silently came, And silently stole away.

Once the forests were filled with sounds, Of hoofs, of turkey and quail; With Indian yells and pioneers aye, As they blazed the Wilderness Trail.

Thee ghosts roam the Dark and Bloody ground, The wilderness no longer calls; The great tall springs seal the Buffalo Trail, The case breaks straight and tall.

They have fallen to progress and the modern age, Of science and atoms and space; With modern ways for modern man, And all must join the race.

But some needless night when all is still, And the mist roams back through the years; You can still hear the hoofs and the Indian hoed, And the aze of the brave pioneer.

The General's Last visit to Carlisle

Highway 68

by J. Arch Bailey

"I sing of arms and heroes, too! Those lines you've often read them through; This story only does relate Of Ten and Now on 68.

They built this road a long ago Linking towns of which you know; It's winding path not always straight; A silent sentinel for 68.

The Old Farm House up there it stands; No joyous laughter, no waving hands; The hills are no more, so desolate; A silent sentinel for 68.

The garden teems with blooming flowers, The morning glories full of the hours; The cooling dews call to its mate; And bring sad news to 68.

The Red Man went this wooded trail Attacking settlers, weak and frail; They stirred the Fort one evening late; At Bryan Station near 68.

The old rock wall is stacked with rose; The hills are no more, so desolate; Quite old and worn and out of date; Is the Vine-covered on 68.

The morning came, those brave men bent; Seeking vengeance as they went; Followed down to a awful fate; At Blue Lick Springs on 68.

The river there was wide and deep; On Yonder side, the hills were steep; McGary yelled at any rate; We'll charge this water on 68.

"Across they went and there they found; The ambushed Indian on the ground; To their dismay, it was too late; Estranged they were on 68.

No marble stone can half way tell; Of deeds so glorious nor how they fell; That hallowed spot we celebrate; In August now, on 68.

Alex Campbell preached a sermon here; He wrecked the faith of many here; Yet every life we consecrate; To Jesus' Name on 68.

Stone Hammer built his mansion there; It's white walls glisten in the air; The swollen water rolls by the gate; And blocks the traffic on 68.

His tomb is there upon the hill; The mound is covered with daffodil; Forgotten may be his cruel fate; He sleeps on Highway 68.

By choice on high went Henry Clay; To Congress Hall's to have his say; On vital matters he did debate; And then returned by 68.

Lon Metcalf filled the cherry tree; With leaden bullets, it's told to me; To fight a duel, traditions state; At Limestone there near 68.

The Riders once did ride by night; The yoman felt a fearful fright; They killed their man from out his gate; O shame on you, "Old 68."

A band of fellows do monthly meet; Extend the hand and grip and greet; They work the Square at Low Twelve lue; Now guess what happens on 68.

O. Johnson had the Shorthorn breed; A better cattle no man can feed; The buyers came from every State; To get that stock on 68.

All stories have a fitting end; My Muse now takes another bend; Of those who've gone just here of late; And left the Highway on 68.

The angels came one early morn; And bore away the spirit form.
