Will a cure for cancer be vintage?—V.K. Robert L. Kaseel, Ph.D., of Memorial Sloan-Kettering Cancer Center in New York City and his coworkers believe this may be the case. They suggest that people who cannot fight their cancers have a deficiency in their blood serum. The serum lacks or is low in a substance called interferon. With more foods being processed, and extra ingredients added, how would a person know if he's receiving proper nutrition?—V.P.
The Food and Drug Administration has proposed a new voluntary nutrition labeling procedure. Many manufacturers list nutritional information which includes: quantities of vitamins, minerals, protein, calories, and carbohydrate per average or usual serving. You can receive a FREE pamphlet entitled, "Food Labels: The Guide to Better Nutrition." It lists what to look for on food labels, and includes a major nutrition chart. For a copy send one long, stamped, self-addressed envelope to me in care of this newspaper.
