The Winds of March

Warren Fisher, editor of the Carlisle Mercury, has a delicacy of touch and charm of expression in dealing with some subjects which none of us can equal. He is especially fine in his writing about Nature. In a delightful editorial on March he quoted some lines about daffodils which reminded me of those exquisite and well-known lines of Shakespeare:

"Daffodils
That come before the swallow dares, and take
The winds of March with beauty;
violets dim,
But sweeter than the lids of Juno's eyes,
Or Cytherea's breath."

LEWIS C. HUMPHREY

Although the writer did not know him intimately, he feels a keen regret that death has claimed Lewis C. Humphrey, for years associated with the old Louisville Post, and recently general manager of the Herald-Post.

Mr. Humphrey was a newspaper man of the highest type, loyal to his friends, vigorous and faithful to a cause, accepting the responsibilities of editorship as a serious duty and a means of service to his city and State. He was a good deal of the idealist, we think, in this man, the vigor of whose pen gave no hint of the dreamer. Yet from our slight acquaintance with him, we are sure that back of his robust support of men and measures lay the dream, whose realization he sought to accomplish with a pen that wrought with a sturdy practicality.

We shall never forget his words of encouragement and appreciation upon the occasion of our only meeting. They meant a great deal more to us, no doubt, than he imagined. We feel that we have lost a friend. We are sure that Kentucky has lost a valuable citizen.

THOUGHT FOR FOREST WEEK

Indeed, the question of conservation has in it even an appeal to the heart and soul of man, because God wove into the fabric of the forest a majestic loveliness and grandeur that is incomparable. No doubt there are men who can not think in terms of beauty, but there are vast numbers of people who see something more in conservation than the protection of the money wealth which comes from the things that God put here and which man has turned to his own advantage with a selfish and prodigal hand.—Hon. Martin L. Davey.

VOICES IN THE WILDERNESS

He that planteth a tree is the servant of God,
He provideth a kindness for many generations,
And faces that he has not seen shall bless.

Quite frequently we have quoted Van Dyke to our purpose in writing in these columns about trees. The quotation seems particularly appropriate to us this week, American Forest Week. It is true that the lover of Nature, the sentimentalist, if you will, speaks in these three lines, but they may be paraphrased to suit the practical.

For the man who plants trees today is serving himself and his own generation as well as providing a kindness for those who succeed him. Many trees grow to a stage of practical usefulness within the span of a short life and the man who plants trees is slow to cut them down. Bringing folk to realize the value of a tree is almost as important, we think, as inducing them to plant, for the cutting comes all too soon, yet.

DON'T QUIT

How many, we wonder, realize the delicate balance maintained by Nature, into which man has flung himself like the proverbial monkey wrench into a piece of well oiled machinery? Remember that man has overturned the balance, when you see a bare and washed hillside; when you read of thousands fleeing from the flood-swept areas of the Mississippi Valley. Remember this, when you buy high-priced lumber, once so plentiful as to be practically valueless, and, more's the pity! so regarded by those who came first to this land so sign lly blessed with natural resources. Verily, we have acted like a parcel of children running wild in a candy store. There has been little thought of conserving God-given resources; seemingly the supply has been inexhaustible. So we have hacked and hewn, burned and dammed in the name of progress, with the ideal of turning wheels and "lines of smokestacks," refusing to realize that we were destroying something quite as valuable as the industries to be erected. We have been disgracefully and inexcusably wasteful and only the cold, protesting voices of the sentimentalists, so called, have been raised to declaim against the orgy of despoliation.

But now even the "great business minds" are beginning to heed the warnings of an impending poverty of natural resources. The buyer of crates and boxes is feeling the pinch; our arms of national defense begin to call upon us to "think of the heart of a spruce when you see an airplane," and of the wood that goes into rifle stocks—trees that may stand between us and defeat upon the battlefield. The farmer is learning his lesson in gullied fields, bare and worthless. Less haste in 10,000 years to make one inch of fertile topsoil and the clearer of a hillside undid her work in one year. And he is paying the penalty of a destroyed natural balance.

It will take much longer than the 150 years of our existence as a nation of careless wasters of natural resources to restore the delicate balance, but it may be done. It will need an active army of conservationists on guard and preaching their gospel of planting and protection, not only during American Forest Week, but during every week.

So if you read the ravings of some sentimental lover of trees who writes of wind singing in the branches, of apple blossoms that "brush the burnished bosom of the dove," of "nests of robins in her hair," and of the groves that were "God's first temples," don't scoff. If you can't join him in his ecstacy and think with him in terms of beauty, remember that he and his kind have been unheeded voices crying in the wilderness of waste these many years, and refrain from sneering at him as a visionary. For he is not, and though he doesn't realize it, perhaps, he is as practical as the most canny captain of industry and has been for years. For has he not cried out against lack of thrift? Small compliment to his heedless compatriots that they have failed to discover the practicality of his preachments, being unable to think in terms of beauty.

DON'T QUIT

When things go wrong, as they sometimes will,
When the road you are trudging seems all up hill,
When the funds are low and the debts are high
And you want to smile, but you have to sigh,
When care is pressing you down a bit,
Rest, if you must, but don't you quit.

Success is failure turned inside out—
The silver tint of the clouds of doubt.

Highways get bicentennial signs

WASHINGTON—Tourists and travelers on the nation's highways during the Bicentennial era will have an easily recognized symbol helping guide them to Bicentennial activities in many areas of the country.

The Federal Highway Administration, in cooperation with the American Revolution Bicentennial Administration (ARBA) has authorized and encouraged States to use the official national Bicentennial symbol on Interstate, primary and secondary highway signs giving destination directions to local Bicentennial activities.

The national Bicentennial symbol takes the form of a five-pointed star, surrounded by continuous red, white and blue stripes which form a second star.

The symbol is widely used now in newspapers and magazines, and by officially designated Bicentennial Communities. It also can be used in private sector Bicentennial projects officially recognized by the ARBA and will be used on products and other items licensed by the ARBA to help commemorate the country's 200th anniversary.

Farmers' needs noted by Senate

Recognizing the difficulties facing American farmers, the Senate in Washington has passed a resolution urging federal agencies to give highest priority to the agricultural and related industries in allocating materials used for producing or distributing fertilizer, fuels and energy, farm chemicals and other essential products.

Senator Marlow Cook says the Sept. 9 resolution, although it lacks any real binding power on the agencies, makes clear the Senate's opinion that "any disruption or dislocation of the nation's agriculture threatens the long-term interest and welfare of producer and consumer alike."

Huddleston explains new legislation

PENSION REFORM

This session of Congress has passed two extremely important pieces of legislation—budget reform and new pension reform. The former imposes on Congress the requirement of putting its fiscal house in order and bringing federal spending under control, while the latter provides protection of retirement benefits for more than 25 million workers.

The pension bill, which President Ford signed into law on Labor Day, has the following key provisions:

•Vesting rights. This provision guarantees than an employee is entitled to a pension after a certain period of service with a company. The period of time required varies under anternative plans—5 years in one case and 10 in another—but it provides protection against a worker losing his pension because he has not served an extremely long period of time.

•Insurance. The bill provides protection against a worker losing his pension because of mismanagement or insufficient money in the pension fund. It also requires adequate funding of pension plans by the parent companies.

•Portability. This voluntary provision allows workers who change jobs to transfer retirement credits to his new company with their approval. This will prevent workers from losing their retirement benefits because they switch jobs.

Self-employed. The bill also increases the limitation on contributions which self-employed persons such as doctors and lawyers can make to their own pension funds.

I was proud to support this legislation every step of the way, and I think it represents a real step forward in guaranteeing that every American will be able to enjoy a comfortable retirement—especially in a time when inflation is eating away at retirement incomes to such an extent that many retirees can hardly make ends meet.

This past week I met again with President Ford's economic advisors about the upcoming domestic summit conference on the economy. I urged them not to wait until next year, as one administration official has predicted, before making substantive changes in economic policy.

As I said then, the American people do not want policy-making by panic, but they do not want to wait five months before the administration starts moving with new policies
