Kay's Kitchen

— By Kay Fisher —

Did you ever wonder what was served in those beautiful cut glass bowls you guard with your life now?

In the Victorian era, the 1870's or '80's, those cut glass pieces were really used and not just for show or ornamentation.

In my reading recently I came across this statement. "There was seldom seen an excellent menue of the 1870's or 80's that did not include either Charlotte Russe or an English Trifle served from the finest cut glass bowl." The article went on to say it would have been a faux pas then to serve only one dessert. Here is a good recipe for Charlotte Russe and easy to make. Good to serve now because it can be made the day before.

CHARLOTTE RUSSE

Soften 1 envelope plain gelatin in 1 cup milk in the top of a double boiler. Beat 4 egg yolks until lemon colored, add ¼ cup sugar and ¼ teaspoon salt. Add to gelatin mixture and cook over simmering water, stirring until smooth. Add ½ teaspoon vanilla; allow to cool.

Beat 4 egg whites until soft peaks form and gradually beat in ¼ cup sugar. Fold egg whites gently into cool custard. Blend in 2 tablespoons of sherry or to taste.

Whip 1 cup heavy cream until stiff; fold into custard mixture.

Line a cut glass bowl with split ladyfingers and sprinkle them with the same kind of wine used in the custard. Pour the custard into the bowl until nearly full. Top with split ladyfingers, sprinkle wine and more custard on them.

Chill several hours or over-night. Decorate with additional whipped cream before serving.

I grew up being served English Trifle often. It wasn't always made with ladyfingers. More often it was made with spongecake squares, squares or slices of pound cake that were not quite moist or fresh enough to be served alone. The pieces of cake were spread with a tart jelly, moistened with sherry, then spread with whipped cream, building to the top of the bowl, and when full, topped with whipped cream and chilled overnight. Of course if we knew we were having guests ladyfingers were purchased and perhaps a custard made to spread over them. But to me the "hurry up-left over cake" version was just as good or better. My mother was always generous with the ingredients so that the "stale" cake would be thoroughly moist.

COUNTRY STYLE APPLE PIE

2 cups apples, cooked and slightly sweetened (or canned apples)
¾ cup sugar
¼ teaspoon salt
1 teaspoon cinnamon
2 tablespoons flour
1 cup cream
2 eggs, beaten
1 pastry for 9-inch pie

TOPPING

¼ cup flour
2 tablespoons butter
¼ cup brown sugar
½ teaspoon cinnamon

Line a 9-inch pie pan with pastry, making a higher fluted edge. Fill with sliced apples. Combine sugar, salt, cinnamon and flour. Beat in cream and eggs with rotary beater. Pour over apples. Combine flour, butter, brown sugar and cinnamon, sprinkle over pie. Bake in moderate oven (400°F.) for 45 minutes. This pie is best served warm.

Serve with ice cream if desired.

Kentucky fiercely battled her way through the American Revolution

by David Kennamer

already established towns.

The citizens of Boonesborough, in a letter of 1780 to George Rogers Clark, described the problem this increased population caused: "The few among us who have long experienced the intolerable hardships of maintaining our post against the barbarous savages, derive very little consolation from the vast addition of numbers now scattered through the various parts of this country. The almost incredible number of distressed and defenseless families settled through our woods for the sake of sustenance instead of adding to our strength, are in fact so many allurements, and must become a daily sacrifice to the savage brutality of our inhuman enemies; who from their unavoidable success will be encouraged to reiterate their attempts."

In an era when surviving from day to day made a man a hero, George Rogers Clark stands out as the man for all seasons on the frontier. In 1777, at the age of 25 he was appointed major in the Virginia militia and made responsible for the defense of Kentucky. Under his command were such formidable frontiersmen as Daniel Boone, Benjamin Logan, John Todd, Simon Kenton and Michael Stoner.

His most famous activity of course was his march on the Northwest Territory and his capture of the British forts of Kaskaskia, Cahokia and Vincinnes in 1778 and 1779. This successful campaign delayed for a year a planned British and Indian offensive that could well have overwhelmed the Kentucky settlements.

Furthermore, the sudden and unexpected appearance of a seemingly invincible, although in reality a rather motley, American army in the Northwest Territory where the British presence had seemed so secure—and the capture of Lt. Gov. Henry Hamilton, the British Commander-in-Chief—demoralized the Indians and gave Clark a reputation among them that was to prove more effective than guns and ammunition.

By 1780, however, the British had recovered enough from Clark's surprises to launch an offensive deep into Kentucky, one that failed only because of the characteristic British inability to mold their large numbers of Indian warriors into disciplined and dedicated soldiers.

An army of 1,000 Shawnee, Wyandot, and Mingo—the most belligerent and aggressive of the Western Indians—together with small detachments of British regulars and veteran rangers commanded by Henry Bird descended upon Kentucky from the north during that summer. Kentucky had withstood such numbers before but this time Bird had with him two cannon that were the key to his initial success.

On June 20, 1780, Bird attacked Ruddle's Station, a new fort on the Licking River near the present town of Cynthiana with some 300 inhabitants. Because the wooden stockade would not withstand the power of the cannon, Ruddle's became the first Kentucky town to surrender. In the bloody aftermath of this capitulation, 100 prisoners were taken and most of the remainder killed.

The way into Kentucky seemed clear and the army marched on a few miles to the south to Martin's Station where they took many prisoners.

At this point, with Kentucky in his grasp, Bird lost control of his Indians. Supply problems, combined with news that Clark was in the vicinity marshalling Kentucky's defenses, caused the Indians to become rebellious and unmanageable, leaving Bird with no choice but to get out of Kentucky as fast as he could.

Faced with these and other difficulties in the East, the British for the moment were unable to give much attention to Kentucky. The sporadic raiding and marauding continued with an occasional foray turning into a small but fierce battle.

Such an encounter resulted in the Battle of Little Mountain, known also as Estill's Defeat. A group of Wyandots attempted to surprise Estill's Station, near the present town of Mt. Sterling. Finding the settlers safely closed up in their stockade, the Indians ravaged the surrounding countryside and withdrew with Captain James Estill and 25 of his hastily gathered neighbors in pursuit.

Estill caught up with the Indians and a small battle ensued in which the Indians gained the advantage, killing seven of the settlers. This small battle filled Kentucky with dread because it showed that the strain of so many years of war had not decreased the determination of their Indian enemies.

The British conducted one more major campaign that resulted in a stunning defeat for the Kentuckians, William Caldwell, commanding 50 rangers and 300 Indians, struck into the heart of Kentucky at Bryan's Station, north of Lexington, in August, 1782.

The town was held without great numbers of casualties and the British-Indian contingent retreated and waited for the anticipated pursuit. After engaging the enemy at the Blue Licks near the present-day border of Nicholas and Robertson counties, the Bryan Station group was defeated in a battle that took 77 Kentucky lives on the spot. The list of dead, from this battle reads like a list of the most famous and capable of the Kentucky frontiersmen. The frontier was shaken like never before because Kentucky had no more experienced and able defenders than these men.

But Kentucky's strength was her ability to endure and time was on her side. Settlers continued to pour into the area and even before the Revolution was formally over, a convention was petitioning Congress for recognition of Kentucky as an independent state in the new nation.

The Battle of Blue Licks, despite its outcome and import, was the last major battle of the Revolution in Kentucky. The peace that was made with England did not end Indian hostilities however and it was well into the 1790s before that threat was eliminated.

Although the role of the Kentucky settlements in the Revolution was in many respects a peripheral one, frontiersmen and women left the infant United States with a very important legacy. The time of their settlements and their ability to hold their ground assured that the western lands were ceded to the United States after the war, giving the new nation a vast western wilderness in which to grow and develop into a major power.

Dear Debbie
Letters to DEBORAH WHITE

DEAR DEBBIE:

A year ago a retired Army colonel and his wife moved into a house next door to ours. He's old and stodgy, but his wife is a sweet person and she often comes in and spends the afternoon with me while I'm cooking for my husband and family. Her husband who hates kids, has warned our little boy about leaving his toy tractor and bicycle in the driveway. He warned him every week for almost two months and then without warning, last week rode over the toys crushing them beyond repair. The colonel's wife is sympathetic toward me, but her husband's actions have put a strain on our relationship. My husband agrees with the colonel—while I think we should report him. I've have called the police myself if it weren't for the fact that I don't want to lose my friendship with his wife.

IRATE

DEAR IRATE:

I'm surprised you didn't reinforce the colonel's warning and see to it that your little boy kept his toys out of the man's driveway. Like it or not, it's his privilege not to like kids and to have the right of way to his own garage.

DEAR DEBBIE:

My son married a wonderful girl two years ago and my husband and I are happy with her in every way except for the fact that she has not as yet called us by name. It's always, "Hello there," or "How you doin'?" or "What's happening?" but never once does she refer to us by name. When they write my son addresses us "Mom and Dad," but that's our son, not our daughter-in-law. What do we do with a girl like this? I couldn't stand her calling me MRS.

MOTHER-IN-LAW

DEAR MOTHER:

Ask her point blank what she would like to call you. It's apparent she doesn't want to refer to you as Mom and Dad, and Mr. and Mrs. is too formal, so ask her what she would be comfortable calling you.

* * *

PERSONAL TO HOT-HEAD: Your calling to account for me must have made you feel a lot better than even you would have believed. You see? You really can catch more flies with honey than vinegar.

* * *

PERSONAL TO ABANDONED: Try and believe it's not the end of the world. I know things must look bleak, but there really is a silver lining behind every cloudy sky—just pick your head up and look. His going may have been the best thing that ever happened to you.

If you have a problem, write to me in care of this newspaper. Personal replies aren't always possible, but I'll answer letters of widest interest in this column.
