LAFFS

"No, it's not for ecology nor the gas shortage. It's all I can afford with three kids in college."

YOU AND YOUR HEALTH
by Peter J. Esser, M.D.

For Mrs. F.: Your recent experience indicates that your doctor walks a tightrope. One slip. Ouch!

I have often said that the art of medicine is as important as its science. Among the necessary characteristics for being a good doctor are: compassion, understanding, patience, a sense of humor, being a good listener, thoroughness and tact.

Each is important, but tact is often overlooked and replaced by brusqueness and a scarcity of words and advice. Blame it on the doctor's lack of time. The hands of the clock keep choking physicians every working day of their lives.

So the doctor is beset by a dilemma. How much time shall he give each patient? What shall he say? How shall he say it?

You go to his office anxious about what his verdict will be. You are frightened as you never have been before. Are you well? Are you sick?

He has examined you. You sit in his consultation room. What will he say? At the moment he is busy writing a prescription. The silence is unbearable and threatens your composure. You resort to joking. "Well, doctor, am I a wreck or not?" This is a way of trying to convince the doctor that you're not scared to death.

Comes the time for tactfulness. What your doctor says and how he says it may give you reason to skip out of his office, stripped of all anxiety. Or, it may convert you into a fearful hypochondriac.

How does the doctor explain a functional, harmless heart murmur to his patient? The reason for doing a biopsy of a suspicious skin growth? The need for further investigation of a lump in the breast? Or, why he thinks it's necessary that you have x-ray studies of your chest and intestines?

Your doctor's problem is this: How to help you without scaring you. This is where the art of medicine comes in. Being empathetic—putting himself in your place—is essential. Some patients "scare easy"; others don't. A tactful doctor will take the time to know how to give individual attention to each patient. This is his daily dilemma.

In a roundabout way, Mrs. F., what I have been saying is this: If still in doubt about how your doctor has been taking care of you, better ask for consultation. Otherwise you'll keep on going to a doctor in whom you have little confidence.
