Have car checked before winter driving

by Jane Hillard
FRANKFORT—Despite the warnings issued by traffic safety officers every winter, accidental asphyxiation or death by carbon monoxide fumes—remains one of the season's major killers.
Last winter, a Kentucky man never woke up after being lulled to sleep in his parked, tightly-closed automobile by the soft, careening warmth from his car heater and maybe—as investigators conjectured afterward—from the soothing influence of a few drinks.
His death was officially attributed to a faulty exhaust system that allowed the deadly fumes to seep through the car floorboards while he slept.
Paul Silvers, assistant director of the state's division of inspections in the Kentucky Department of Transportation here, tells the story to illustrate this very real danger to winter motorists.

"It is during the winter months—when motorists drive with their cars sealed tightly to keep out the cold—that the danger is the greatest," he said. "And the best protection against it happening to you is to get that exhaust system checked now—even if your car is not due for its annual inspection for several months yet."
Snow tires also are a good investment. They should be put on a car at the first advent of bad weather and removed as soon as dangerous road conditions disappear in the spring.

"The most important thing to remember about snow tires is that you must use the same size on both sides of the axle," he said. "If the car is not balanced on tires of equal size, you'll be setting up an unsafe condition which counteracts the skid-protection that the tires are designed to provide."
Obviously, good visual conditions also are a safety factor for the winter driver and you will want to know that your defroster is working properly, he said. Silvers also urged that motorists check the windshield level in their automatic window washing mechanism so that the liquid won't freeze on the windshield and obscure the driver's vision.
