Kentucky farmers to find nitrogen scarce in spring

Kentucky farmers are likely to find 25-30 percent less nitrogen available in spring compared to last spring according to reports from the University of Kentucky College of Agriculture. Dr. John Hagland, Associate Director of the UK Agronomy Department, indicates that such shortages to Kentucky could be between 20 and 34 million pounds of actual nitrogen. Soil specialists in the department say this shortage would represent enough nitrogen to apply 100 lbs. N per acre to 200-300 thousand acres of corn, or enough needed to apply 150-180 lbs. N per acre on all of the state's tobacco acreage.

Dr. Hagland points out that Kentucky farm leadership and congressional delegation are working on this problem but unless a solution to the problem is found and discussed when the growing season begins, farmers may have to shift production plans.
