Red Cross says mobile homes vulnerable to high winds

The "up to 80 miles an hour winds" that swept through Western and Central Kentucky March 20 left a total of 23 trailers destroyed and 22 with major damage according to figures released April 7 by the Kentucky Division American Red Cross.

The storm once again points out that mobile homes appear to be especially vulnerable to high winds," Richard Dooley, Disaster Services chairman of the Louisville Area Red Cross chapter, said, "although some securely anchored dwellings escaped severe damage."

"Strong winds can roll over and badly damage a mobile home that is not tied down with over-the-top steel straps, fastened securely to anchors embedded in the ground," Mr. Dooley said.

He recalled that in the wave of tornadoes in April 1974 alone, more than 3,000 mobile homes were destroyed or seriously damaged—at that time Kentucky was one of the states hit hardest.

He said that two types of ties are needed—the over-the-top ties which keep the home from overturning and frame ties which prevent it from being blown off its supports.

Proper equipment will cost around $100 in most areas with installation by a contractor costing another $100 or thereabouts. "But the money spent for securely anchoring a mobile home is well worth the price, especially since many insurance companies now are refusing to insure mobile homes unless they are well anchored," he said.

Mr. Dooley urged mobile home occupants to be ready to take shelter in a substantial building whenever warned of an approaching tornado, or even of a severe thunderstorm with high winds.

Mr. Dooley stated that as of March 31, the Kentucky Division American Red Cross had expended $18,281.50 in assisting victims of the storm that swept through the state.
