University of Kentucky Journalism school remodels photo and news laboratories

The University of Kentucky School of Journalism is undergoing renovation and equipment changes this summer at a cost of more than $100,000. "The new equipment and remodeling underlines the determination of the UK administration to have the journalism program in first-class shape," said Dr. Dwight I. Teeter Jr., professor and acting director of the school.

The School of Journalism lost accreditation of its news-editorial sequence last year after an evaluation by the American Council on Education for Journalism (ACEJ). The program will be evaluated during the coming academic year, possibly as early as next fall.

An 'old time' school system

by Jimmy Smith
No one ever makes it through the present day schooling system without hearing the continual complaining of teachers about how they are underpaid or the unceasing babbling of students about how they are locked up in a prison and have no freedoms. Perhaps a brief look at the schooling system of one small school in 1832, in Cole county, Missouri, might awaken us to the assets and liberties that we enjoy today—compared to "way back when."

The following article of agreement was entered into by the late Martin D. Noland for the school year of 1832 with the people of Cole County Missouri: "The said Noland doth agree upon his part to teach a common school in a school house in the neighborhood of John H. Stone's Branches, teaching spelling, reading, writing, and arithmetic. The term proposed to be taught is three months or one quarter containing 65 days, five days in a week. The hours of school, for commencing, at an hour by sun in the morning, dismissal at an hour by sun in the evening and allow a reasonable time at the middle of each day for recreation. "Said Noland binds himself to keep good order in school to the best of his power and ability. If it should be the desire of the subscribers that the school be under the inspection of trustees, the teacher has no objection on his part. The trustees are to be three distinguished men, who chosen by employers, and one by the teacher. "The subscribers on their part bind themselves by these presents to pay said Noland two dollars per scholar per quarter at the end of said quarter, newly designed and equipped laboratory which can accommodate 16 news photography students at one time. The lab has been air conditioned and 10 cameras and 10 photo enlargers have been purchased. "Other new equipment includes 20 electric typewriters for use in the newswriting laboratory. Electronic editing equipment including four visual display terminals has been ordered, along with photocomposition equipment. "It's important that our students become familiar with the electric typewriters and electronic editing equipment because newspapers of all sizes are using them," said Teeter. During the fall semester, students will be able to produce camera-ready copy for laboratory newspapers in the editing lab which will be created on the second floor of the Journalism Building.

The newspapers are intended for educational purposes and will not be for general campus distribution. "With the addition last fall of three new faculty members with recent journalism experience we are able to go to small class sizes—a limit of 15 students—in key writing and reporting courses," Teeter said. "The strong professional orientation of our new faculty members will strengthen the professional preparation and practical experience our students receive," he added. Ten Elbert Phi Beta Kappa Teeter pointed out that 10 Journalism students were elected to membership in Phi Beta Kappa, national honor society in arts and sciences, during the past year. The study sequences of the school—general editorial and advertising—have been revised so that a student cannot have more than 30 hours of credit in journalism and communications. Students also must have at least 18 upper division hours of study in an area of concentration outside of journalism. "We think the revised sequences give the students ample professional education, while at the same time providing them with an in-depth knowledge of another field," Teeter said. College of Communications.

The School of Journalism, formerly part of the College of Arts and Sciences, was recently joined with the Department of Human Communications to form the College of Communications. Dr. Robert Murphy, who previously served as chairman of the Department of Journalism and director of the School of Communications, has been appointed acting dean of the college. Teeter is serving as acting director of the School of Journalism and Dr. Robert Bostrom has been appointed acting chairman of the Department of Human Communication.

Rev. Rice writes new book

Rev. Harold L. Rice of Wrightsville, Ga., formerly of Carlisle, is the author of a new book "For Such A Time As This." "I believe the Bible literally," declares the Rev. Harold L. Rice in his penetrating analysis of the truth of biblical prophecies in his book published by Exposition Press of New York. "I believe that God wrote the message, or caused men to write the message in a language that could be understood. I do not believe that He would give His word in such a mysterious and symbolic language that He would condemn men to an eternal hell simply because they were not able to understand." Showing how our misunderstandings of prophecy have come about from our failure to interpret it literally, the Rev. Rice examines with scholarly insight the truths of the Bible. "For Such A Time As This" sells for $4.95. An order blank may be found elsewhere in The Mercury.
