Grossly misquoted!

The Child and Family Service Act of 1975 (Senate Bill 626) has been grossly misquoted and distorted in a recent newspaper article, being widely circulated. Many well-thinking individuals have been unduly riled, believing that this bill is communistic—that the government is proposing to take over the upbringing of our children.

After obtaining S.626 from Sen. Wendell Ford's office, and after reading its 62 pages, skipping only those portions relating to the details of spending the $150,000,000 this year and the $200,000,000 allocated for 1977, we feel in all fairness that we must report it as another "give away" program.

We are against it as we are most "give away" programs until our country is on a more financially secure footing.

But, it is really a bill much like Head Start—plus it provides for day care in the child's home, in group homes, or in other child care facilities; it provides for health, social, recreational and educational programs; it provides for prenatal and other medical care to expectant mothers; it provides for programs designed to meet the special needs of ethnic groups, including minority groups, Indian, migrant children, and children from families with special language needs.

It is a huge "give away" program which provides all of these items plus more to parents of economically disadvantaged, handicapped, and Indian children. However, all the way through it stresses parental participation.

Below we have quoted verbatum the "Statement of Findings and Purpose" directly from S626. The entire Bill has been placed in the Nicholas County Library where anyone who is interested in reading it, may do so.

We hope many of you will read this bill, and decide for yourselves whether you are for or against it, and then write Senators Wendell Ford and Walter D. Huddleston and Congressman Carl D. Perkins letting them know your views on the subject.

S.626

Statement of Findings and Purpose

SEC. 2. (a) The Congress finds that—

(1) the family is the primary and the most fundamental influence on children;

(2) child and family service programs must build upon and strengthen the role of the family and must be provided on a voluntary basis only to children whose parents or legal guardians request such services, with a view toward offering families the options they believe are most appropriate for their particular needs;

(3) although there have been increased services for children of working mothers and single parents and although Headstart and similar programs have provided supplemental educational and other services for children, such services have not been made available to families to the extent that parents consider necessary, there are many other children whose parents are working full or part time without adequate arrangements for their children, and there are many children whose families lack sufficient resources who do not receive adequate health, nutritional, educational and other services;

(4) it is essential that the planning and operation of such programs be undertaken as a partnership of parents, community, private agencies and State and local government with appropriate supportive assistance from the Federal Government.

(b) It is the purpose of this Act to provide a variety of quality child and family services in order to assist parents who request such services, with priority to those pre-school children and families with the greatest economic or human needs, in a manner designed to strengthen family life and to insure decisionmaking at the community level, with direct participation of the parents of the children served and other individuals and organizations in the community interested in child and family service (making the best possible use of public and private resources), through a partnership of parents, State and local government and the Federal Government, building upon the experience and success of Headstart and other existing programs.

Fire false alarms!

The Nicholas County Fire Department was called to a false alarm on the Headquarters Road Sunday evening by a youngster. It was a false alarm.

Fire Chief Woody Wilson said Monday that he suspected it would be a false alarm, but naturally the chance could not be taken in case a fire did exist.

The occupants of the house had been out for a ride, and as they returned home were frightened and badly shaken to see flashing lights, several cars and the fire truck. They, naturally, suspected all kinds of bad things had befallen their home in their absence.

The youngster who made the call probably had no idea how much trouble he had caused. May we suggest that all parents remind their children of the seriousness of making a false alarm call to the Fire Department.

In this instance, nobody was hurt. Next time, someone could be hurt rushing to answer a fire call. It would be bad enough if someone was hurt rushing to a bonafide fire. It would be a catastrophe if someone is hurt answering a false alarm.

Letters from our readers

To The Carlisle Mercury:

I am sorry to hear that State Senator Tom Ward, Versailles, is an alcoholic. However, I admire his honesty for publicly admitting that he has this illness.

The senator was arrested on a drunk driving charge last week on his way home from a legislative session in Frankfort. He chose to "face the consequences" rather than fall back on a little known law that exempts legislators from arrest on their way to or from Frankfort.

He said that he intends to lick the problem to prevent any further embarrassment to the people who counted on him.

I pray that he does, as we need good, honest people like him, in government.

MAGICWORD

HOW TO PLAY: Read the list of words. Look at the puzzle. You'll find these words in all directions – horizontally, vertically, diagonally, backwards. Draw a circle around each letter of a word found in the puzzle then strike it off list. Circling it will show a letter has been used but will leave it visible should it also form part of another word. Find the big words first. When letters of all listed words are circled, you'll have the given number of letters left over. If they'll spell out your MAGICWORD.

4-H'ers voice project benefits

Browsing through some of our Nicholas county project records for the past year, one finds that into learnings experienced in 4-H have been observed. The basic skills of the various projects taken by the youngsters are stated by them as they evaluate their own learnings.

For example: Sarah Hamm said in her Home Furnishings Project Record: "I learned to coordinate my colors so they would go well together." Robert Lyons stated: "I learned in my Electric Project that safety is very important." Mike Webb said, "I enjoyed my tobacco project because it taught me management and also provided me with a good profit." Robin Howard learned some simple recipes in her Foods Project. Michelle Knapke said, "I really didn't know what intense heat can do to foods, especially cheese until I conducted an experiment in my Foods Project." Brenda McDonald said, "Mrs. Wilson Mathes (4-H Foods Leader) taught us many things, such as how to measure correctly, make good buys and nutritious values of foods."

These examples are only a selected few but they say, "I learned something this year and I can tell you exactly what I have learned."

The youngsters also realize their projects benefit them at home. Mary Beth Knapke said, "I opened cans of vegetables, help set the table and clean up the dishes to help my mother."

Amy Platt said she could help earn money for things she needs with her Tobacco Project.

The youngsters often go a step farther and express how their projects will help them in the future. Margaret Hamm's projection of her first clothing project is, "I know that someday when I am older, I can save money by making my clothes."

Grant Mathes says, "Not only have I had a lot of fun, but 4-H provided me with a future in making money by selling calves."

Even 4-H'ers 9-14 years of age know what 4-H can and will do for them. That's part of the beauty of the program. Charlene Darrell's insight of what 4-H is all about was reflected when she said, "There were good and slow times, but I tried to do my best . . . I knew I would have something to be proud of at the end of the year . . . and I was . . . I had completed my first dress . . . But, I never could have done it without leadership."

— How true this statement is. Even a 13-year-old knows leadership is the oar that pushes the 4-H boat through the snags to complete the journey.

Recruitment of new leaders is basic to more Nicholas county youngsters experiencing these learnings, as well as fun experiences.

We have a lot of youngsters who feel 4-H is important. Suzanne Gudgell says, "I have a lot of things to do but it seems like I always put 4-H first. 4-H is fun."

Well, Well!

A 24-hour layover!

Now, the U.S. Postal Service is seeking more money, again, so soon, yep!

They've cut local working hours and service to the point that there is not much sense in having corner boxes (what few there are). Mail placed in a box after the afternoon pickup stays there for 24-hours, all of which points up the fact that mail that has a time element involved, like a tax payment, should be taken to the postoffice.

I suppose the USPS wants to discourage people, get 'em to cut down on their letter writing or maybe put businesses out of business with ever higher rates.

Senator Dee Huddleston

REPORTS TO THE PEOPLE OF KENTUCKY

BLACKBIRD CASE ILLUSTRATES GOVERNMENT BUREAUCRACY

Kentucky's recent experience in trying to rid the Western section of the state of millions of disease-causing "blackbirds" is illustrative of the kind of bureaucratic roadblocks and hassles that many American citizens and businessmen run into every day when dealing with Big Government.

Despite ample proof that the birds contribute to the lung disease histoplasmosis and cause millions of dollars in economic damage, the federal government and the court system continually created delays.

The Kentucky and Tennessee Congressional delegations met with Attorney General Levi, Interior Secretary Kleppe, and countless middle-level bureaucrats in those agencies and others.

Finally, when we realized that neither the courts nor the government would move in time to take action this winter, we passed an emergency bill without hearings and without going through committees. This was a highly unusual procedure, but we were left with no recourse because of inaction by federal agencies and the slowness of the courts.

Thankfully, President Ford had the courage to withstand the emotional opposition generated by the two New York protectionist organizations and sign the bill into law.

I hope that we can now apply Tergitol and rid Western Kentucky of this menace.

Even though we did finally get a solution, the episode is merely symtomatic of a larger problem, the ability and speed with which government can overcome its internal bureaucratic roadblocks and regulations to act to meet urgent needs of the people.

If government cannot overcome these kinds of obstacles in an urgent matter of public health, such as the blackbird case, then it gives me great concern about a lot of other areas of government.

Government is supposed to be the instrument through which people get their problems solved; in too many cases government has become the obstacle rather than the instrument of solution.

The metal of the wire paper clip and the chemicals used to process stabilization paper—the photographic paper upon which columns of type matter are produced—had an electrolysis like action. The clip rusted and the rust ruined anything that it touched.

After wrecking several columns of type matter, someone in the shop put a paper clip over a piece of bond paper, then covered the clip with Scotch tape. The bond paper stops electrolysis on the underside of the clip and the tape stops the action on the top and between other strips of stabilization paper.

They may manufacture plastic coated paper clips, but if they do, we don't know about it, besides our method of coating works quite well.

I've been warned

Yes, I guess warned is the word. One of our editors says she has a lengthy item this week. It pertains to Senate Bill 626 which created much furor in these parts last week. The gist of this government give-away is printed for your perusal.

Since the item is long, I can cut this short.

Russ Metz!

Of mouthwash, mowers, praying mantises and other hogwash

Nothing is sacred to the federal government. Motherhood, apple pie and now Listerine is suspect.

It's a lot of hogwash, the Federal Trade Commission contends, that you can spook a bad cold by gargling with Listerine. And that company ought not be talking on the boob tube like it is.

The next thing you know the FTC will be telling us yellow salve will not cure stubbed toes and greasing the rusty nail with pure hog lard does not prevent lockjaw.

I think FTC misses the whole point in the Listerine Connection. Anyone man enough to gargle that horrible-tasting stuff regularly is not going to be decked by anything as minor as a sore throat or bad cold. So what if it lacks a certain scientific rigor. Surely the FTC has better things to do than try to destroy an illusion that gargling is the American national bathroom anthem, killing germs and sissies on contact.

I'm not pumping for Listerine. Never use the stuff. My mother got me hooked on good red linament as a more versatile remedy for common household diseases. It's cheaper, adjustable and can be worn inside or out. You cut it with water to the Fahrenheit you can stand and slosh it around in your gullet until the tears flow and go right on singing in the rain.

The feds weren't happy just to bring back bad breath. They also banned DDT so giant praying mantises can take over the country. They even want to make power lawn mowers safer so we all will be in the best of health for the great infestation.

They laughed when Earl Butz, a good old country boy, sat down with his tin bucket and kerosene. "That's the way we used to do it back on the farm," he said.

Bug off, Earl, everyone said. Everyone except me. I'm a veteran of the Butz Bug Bucket Brigade and know it works.

You pour a dab of coal oil into a bucket and go down the rows of potatoes shaking the bugs off the plants into the bucket. After you have cleaned out the patch, you simply put a match to the kerosene and cremate the crawly critters. It is a lot less messy than hitting them with a hammer or squashing them between your fingers.

Then someone discovered you couldn't taste the arsenic of lead in the spuds if you soaked down the bugs on the leaves and the tin bucket went back to the milkshed. There was a lot of snickering and pointing at Old Earl over the kerosene caper, but I can tell you that's the way we did it back during poredom.

And now the French and English have come up with a monstrous airplane shaped like a giant praying mantis that makes another Arab rich each time it takes off. If they want to deplete their national treasuries and leaders everywhere over there keeping that silly King Kong insect in the air, it's their funeral. Muddying up our atmosphere is something else. We don't need any help from them.

A couple of Saturdays ago, mamma and I stayed at a motel next to the Louisville airport and learned how it felt to have 747's take off from your pillow all night. It got so bad I had to trade sides in the bed to get some sleep. That French Concorde makes 10 times the racket of our jets which should be about as welcome as the shingles.

Then, if that don't scorch your petunias, think about the feds adding $44 to the price of your lawn mower to make it safer for you to die unhealthy. Power lawn mowers throw rocks, the bureaucrats are just now finding out, and they want to Nadarize them so they'll be safe at any lawn.

One of the safety features would be a dead-man switch that would cut the engine when your grip on the handle is released. It will be made no doubt by the same wonderful folks who gave us the automatic auto seat belt buzzer and designed to self-destruct when brought into contact with a pair of wire snippers.

Again the fed zealots miss the whole point. Power lawn mowers are made to throw rocks to keep away all distractions from little boys mowing the grass. And also to return the junk your neighbors sailed on your lawn the last time he mowed his yard. Along with all that, some mowers will even cut the grass.

Now that our automobiles have been sufficiently loused up by government pedagetry, it stands to reason they'd move on to lawn mowers. Anything that works properly without governmental intervention is abominable in the eyes of a feathermerchant and must be investigated.

Our only hope is that the Concorde praying mantis will land only in Washington where the noise will never be noticed by the deaf ears of all the bureaucrats and the huge cloud of smoke it leaves will quickly be carried away by the hot air rising from that hotbed of smarts.

At the very least, Listerine ought to be good for taking the taste out of things the governments jams down our throats.

Onward, upward.

Your representative in Frankfort

Governor Julian Carroll's proposal to outlaw commercial bail bondsmen in Kentucky sped through the Senate last week and was immediately signed into law.

Bills to permit lower milk prices, require prisoners to serve minimum sentences and regulate legislative lobbyists met roadblocks by their respective committees, meanwhile.

House Bill 254, which would transfer bail bond responsibilities to court clerks' offices, cleared the Senate by a 35-to-2 vote and was signed by the Governor the same day. The bill will take effect this summer, barring a delay which could result from an anticipated court challenge by the bail bond industry.

Senate Bill 34, which would permit retailers to sell milk below cost, was tabled in the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Natural Resources. The action means the bill is dead, for all practical purposes, this session.

Spokesmen for consumers had supported the bill, saying it would lead to lower milk prices. The committee, however, found in a survey of nine nearby states that milk prices were lower only when milk was used as a sale item to get shoppers into a store. The total price of all grocery items, in such cases, indicated no net savings to consumers, the panel found.

House Bill 144, which would have required prisoners to serve a third of their sentences before being eligible for parole, was tabled in the House Committee on Judiciary—Shlutes, by a vote of 8-to-6.

The bill had generated considerable controversy at a public hearing last year. Supporters contended it would deter released prisoners from committing additional crimes. Opponents, however, argued that flexability in granting parole was necessary to encourage prisoner rehabilitation.

House Bill 149, to regulate legislative lobbyists, fell one vote short of the number needed to get out of the House Committee on State Government. The vote on the bill was 8-to-3.

The committee is expected to vote again on the measure which would redefine "lobbying" and require all lobbyists to file four financial reports for each regular legislative session. Two of the reports would be required during each session. At present, lobbyists must file only one report 30 days after a session ends.

An attempt to delay House action on a resolution to rescind Kentucky's ratification of the Equal Rights Amendment failed last week when the House Rules Committee rejected 10-to-6 a motion to recommit the measure to a standing committee.

The resolution—House Joint Resolution 7—was scheduled for floor action on Wednesday.

Senate Bill 56, to establish a legislative code of ethics, was returned to the Senate Committee on State Government for a committee substitute. The revised bill will attempt to clarify an amendment, which the committee had approved, permitting lawyer-legislators to represent clients in business involving state agencies.
