

Raised highway pavement markers proving popular

By James Hillard
Reflectorized raised pavement markers will be placed on portions of non-interstate highways in 15 Kentucky counties next summer under a contract for which the state Bureau of Highways will make bids Dec. 15.

Gov. Julian M. Carroll said similar markers recently placed along center lines of some major Kentucky highways are definite safety factors and have been very well received by the public.

The Transportation Department will let a single contract to cover all the work in the 15-county area. The markers will be put on other than four-lane superhighways, which were the first to get done.

The work will be started next spring and completed during the 1976 construction season. Department spokesmen said that the experiment markers can only be put down during warm weather in order to get a bond between the markers and the paving material. They added that the work goes fast once it gets under way.

Secretary of Transportation John C. Roberts listed the following counties which will get the markers: Bell, Boone, Boyd, Boyle, Daviess, Fayette, Franklin, Jefferson, Kenton, Knox, Laurel, Lincoln, McCracken, Pulaski and Woodford.

The contract now up for bid is the third. The second, which was let to Valley Fence Co. of Louisville in August of this year, calls for application in 13 counties next spring.

Under the first contract, the Interstate Traffic Equipment Co. of New Haven, Conn., applied the system to pavement in seven widely separated areas of Kentucky, including work on 175, 164 and the Watkinson Expressway. Work under the first contract was completed in nearly all the scheduled areas before the onset of cold weather.

The markings have caused much favorable comment from the public and requests for the program have poured into the Bureau of Highways, said Bob Flesner, director of the division of traffic.

"Drivers find the markers very helpful at night and often remark on the increased visibility they afford when driving in the rain after dark," said Flesner.

Lexington Center

to take care of any accidental problems that the center opens.

The convention-exhibition hall can handle all kinds of conventions and meetings and is expected to be a highly popular meeting place for state, regional and national groups.

With its movable walls all open, an exhibit space of over 45,000 square feet is available. This space can be partitioned for medium-sized and small exhibitions. In addition, for smaller meetings there are four meeting rooms with about 1,000 square feet each.

Groups using the convention-exhibition hall can stay at the Hyatt House, shop at the mall, attend a function at Rupp Arena, and use the exhibit space, all while never venturing out into the weather.

Bookings are already being made for Jan. 1, 1971, and after. Early indications are that the Lexington Center, with its convenient location near the geographical center of the state, will be a very desirable facility for conventions and meetings.

The retail mall, which will provide for retail shopping and the entertainment for downtown Lexington. Its restaurants and shops, stressing the smaller, high quality store, will be open to the community as well as to visitors at Lexington Center.

The Lexington Center project is of such magnitude that it is expected to make this Blue Grass city competitive with larger cities in the region.

"I see the day when many of the top attractions that have gone to Louisville or Cincinnati, come to Lexington," noted Tom Minter, executive director of Lexington Center.

That would be a welcome change for residents of Lexington and Central Kentucky, who have had to travel long distances for the kind of entertainment and convention facilities that, in less than a year, will be reality at the Lexington Center.

Mr. and Mrs. J.K. Kenney entered the University Hospital in Lexington on Saturday.

Danny Johnson of Hodgenville visited Miss Yvonne Hall and Mrs. Hall and Mrs. Billy Knipperberg and family. Mrs. Jerry Galbraith and Andrea and Mrs. Sterling Holler visited Mr. and Mrs. Tom and Mrs. Gene Wagoner accompanied Gene to a doctor in Lexington on Monday. He remains about the same.
