State Beekeeping Specialist William Eaton holds a "super" from a Kentucky beehive. Other supers or frames are still in the hive below. The bees will make and store up to 200 pounds of honey per hive on these frames during one season. This picture was taken in the spring when the bees were just beginning to produce honey.

Beekeeping is alive

FRANKFORT—Not too many people think about bees this time of year, but William Eaton is an exception. Eaton is the beekeeping specialist for the Kentucky Department of Agriculture and the editor of "The Kentucky Beekeeper's Quarterly."

Eaton is concerned with bees year-round as he prepares the magazine which is circulated to the state's beekeepers. As beekeeping specialist for the Commonwealth, he also is called upon to help deal with problems, certify bees for transportation out of Kentucky and present programs to beekeeping organizations throughout the state.

Winter is a dormant season for bees, Eaton said. But come spring, things should really start humming—for both Eaton and the bees.

Bees come out of their hives to start gathering nectar at first bloom and keep up their activity until cool fall weather slows them down. They then cluster in their hives for the winter.

During the bees' dormant season, Eaton works closely with beekeeping groups, helping them improve the quality of honey, as well as stimulating its consumption.

Eaton also deals with local fair officials, helping them promote honey shows and standardize the judging criteria.

He feels that the mission of his position is "to improve the quality of honey at the grass-roots level." Quality of honey must be improved, according to Eaton, to "keep in step with the demands of the educated consumer."

Honey production is a million-dollar industry in Kentucky with over 600 beekeepers producing the sweet, golden fluid which Eaton calls a "miracle food."

Many of the Commonwealth's honey producers have small operations with the average number of hives probably under 10, Eaton said. Only a few approach real commercial production quantity levels of 400-500 hives. For these few people, honey production is a full time proposition; for the average beekeeper, it is just a sideline or hobby.

The real role of the honey bee in Kentucky is as a pollinator of fruit and seed crops. Honey and beeswax produced $1.5 million in revenue during 1975. According to Eaton, the pollination value of honey bees in 1960 was estimated between $8-10 million, and would be considerably more now.

For beginning beekeepers, Eaton recommends expert advice. Although a person can get everything he needs to start a hive for around $100, experienced help can keep the experiment from going wrong. The dimensions and the location of a hive are critical for raising healthy, productive bees.

If the beekeeper does everything right, a colony of bees can produce up to 200 pounds of honey per hive in clover regions.

Beekeepers should expect to get stung, warned Eaton. He says he has been stung many times. His advice is "don't be over-zealous" and watch out for adverse reactions to the stings. A person who exhibits supersensitivity to bee stings should avoid beekeeping, Eaton suggested.

Eaton also advises consumers that color is not a factor in honey quality. Kentucky produces honey in colors ranging from water-white to dark amber. The color is a product of the type of bloom which makes up the major source of the nectar gathered by the honey bees and each color is unique, he said.

Headquarters Homemakers meet March 3 with Mrs. Frank Gudgell ; Mrs. Sexton co-hostess

The Headquarters Homemakers met Wednesday, March 3 at the home of Mrs. Frank Gudgell. Mrs. Marion Sexton was co-hostess.

Mrs. Reynolds Allison presided. The minutes and treasurer's report were given.

A report of the Council meeting was given. The tentative date of the annual homemakers meeting is Thursday, May 20. The National Homemakers Week will be observed Friday, May 7 with a tea and craft show.

Plans were made to serve lunch Saturday, March 13 at the Martin sale at the Armory.

The lesson, "Brunch or Lunch" was given by Mrs. Reynolds Allison and Mrs. George Dale.

Mrs. Dale read a poem by Edgar Guest that described the three kinds of hostesses. They were the "fussy kind", the "flexible kind", and the "sorry kind".

Mrs. Allison brought out the fact that home cooking is coming back. They explained how to make crepes and showed the kind of skillet to use and discussed the making of coffee cake and tossed salad. These things were served as part of the lunch.

The Bicentennial colors were used in the table decorations with the liberty bell as the focal point.

There were 15 members and Mrs. Margie Wilson present.

Mrs. Geneva Allison had charge of the recreation.
