Report on packaging burley released

A report on packaging burley tobacco, prepared by a committee of scientists in the University of Kentucky College of Agriculture, was released recently at a meeting on campus.

The report summarized specific findings from analytical review and evaluation of available data. It concluded that the use of plastic packaging for burley tobacco is economically feasible.

Based on field observations and survey results, it was concluded that the use of plastic packaging for burley tobacco is economically feasible and will result in savings to the grower.

The approximate material cost for cotton twine and paper wrap (if paper) is estimated to be about 10 percent less than the cost of the conventional method used by the grower.

The report recommended that the use of plastic packaging for burley tobacco be encouraged, as it will result in savings to the grower and improve the quality of the product.

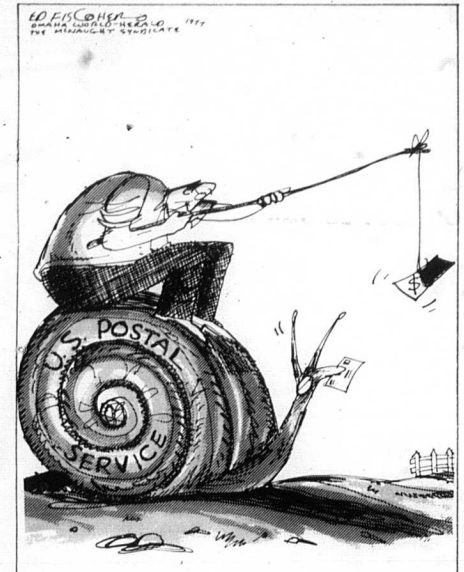

The report also noted that the use of plastic packaging will result in a higher quality product and a longer shelf life.
