Three Nicholas football players receive All-State honors again

Dwaine Williams, Joe Hudbell and Clifford Thompson of Nicholas County's High School Football Team have been named by the Herald-Leader as All-State football players.

Tobacco market opens Jan. 4

Demand for Burley tobacco was a little stronger during the fourth week of auction, reports the Federal-State Market News Service. However, quality was not quite as good compared with the previous week. Volume was expected to buy their 1978 licenses.

In a sense, that license can also be considered a Christmas present—a gift to wildlife conservation. The money spent on the license makes up approximately 80 per cent of the department of fish and wildlife's financial.

And you might not know it, but any hunting or fishing operation on your property is also a present to conservation. Through an 11 per cent federal excise tax on many goods, money is provided for Kentucky (and the other states) to conduct essential wildlife research and to acquire lands for wildlife.

Although you don't have any choice about paying that excise tax, and although the law requires that you have a license to hunt or fish, it's still possible to call these monies "gifts." For like all presents, they are given voluntarily. It was the sportsmen themselves who asked that laws be passed to tax themselves on state and federal levels to support fish and wildlife conservation.

To a non-hunter it must seem strange to think of a shotgun and a box of ammunition, along with a license to hunt, to be used in the field, as a present to wildlife. But those familiar with modern wildlife management know that the hunter is actually the best friend wildlife has.

The money hunters provide pays the salaries of those who enforce fish and wildlife laws and of wildlife biologists who conduct scientific studies and carry out management practices. Sportsman's money buys land for wildlife, land safe from urban sprawl and other habitat destroying practices which represent the most serious threats to wildlife today.

Sportsman's money is not used on game species alone. Wildlife management areas (or scientifically designed wildlife sanctuaries on private lands) provide homes for a wide variety of wildlife species, among them song birds, insect eating birds and rodent controlling birds of prey.

Money from fishing licenses and from the federal tax on angling equipment helps build lakes and provides access points to rivers and streams. It pays for the construction and operation of hatcheries and fisheries research projects. It funds environmental investigations which help keep our waters clean and pollution free.

The license buying sportsman is also giving a present to his fellow citizens who do not hunt or fish, since he is relieving them of an additional tax burden. Without the sportsman, the wildlife research and acquisition would have to come from general revenue funds, but under a system like Kentonky's the total costs of operating the fish and wildlife department come from hunters and fishermen, with no general tax monies involved at all.

These new licenses, by the way, are now available at all county court clerk's offices and at many sporting goods stores, tackle shops or similar establishments. And finally from all of us here at the Department of Fish and Wildlife Resources, a Merry Christmas and a Happy New Year.

These same three football players were named to other All-State teams earlier.
