"I know personally I would never tie another hand if it's approved," Tucker said. "I would be glad to go with balling or sheeting, whichever the tobacco companies prefer. Either way is many times better than the old way."

Tucker said he thinks all segments of the tobacco industry should work together to get final approval for loose-leaf barley sales.

"Warehousemen, in particular, should look for ways to accommodate these new marketing methods," Tucker noted. "Tobacco warehousemen are a business, evidently a right lucrative business, and warehousemen ought to be in favor of whatever way the farmer can make the most money."

The high level of enthusiasm among tobacco growers who have tried balling and sheeting doesn't surprise Bill Balden, Boyle county farmer who is chairman of the committee overseeing the loose-leaf program.

"Farmers are desperate for ways to cut down the cost of labor involved in producing barley," Balden said recently. "Loose-leaf marketing seems to offer the best hope for substantial savings in this area."

Balden said the program's sponsors have examined the impact of the new methods on each segment of the industry, from the farmer to the warehouseman to the manufacturer.

"We are convinced, at this point, that loose-leaf barley sales can be implemented through the present price support program and marketing system, and that the quality of the tobacco, as well as its suitability for domestic and export trade, will be maintained," Balden said.
