way, co-directors of the Urban Studies Center's population research division. The report disaggregates new population estimates for each of Kentucky's 120 counties by race, age and sex.

On a statewide basis, it shows that between 1970 and '79 the number of Kentuckians under age 20 decreased by 30,000 and the number of those over 65 increased by 34,000 during the same ten-year period. Those under 20 now constitute 35.6 percent of the total population, whereas in 1970 they made up 38.5 percent. Those over 65 now constitute 10.9 percent of the total Kentucky population, compared with 10.5 percent in 1970.

The report further reveals that the total population of Kentucky increased in the five-year period by an estimated 123,411 persons, from 3,220,713 in 1970 to 3,344,124 in 1975. This represents an increase of 3.8 percent. One-third of the increase was attributed to a net migration into the state, while two-thirds was the result of the excess of births over deaths.

The report estimates that the total number of females in Kentucky's population in 1979 rose to 1,747,489 to constitute 51.69 percent of the total. The estimated number of males was 1,596,635, or 48.31 percent of the total population. In comparison, the percentage of females counted in the 1970 Census constituted only 50.94 percent of the total population while the percentage of males was 49.06 percent.

IT LOOKS MORE like a country club than hospital, but this is the Shriners Orthopedic hospital on Richmond Road in Lexington. Over $75 million has been spent since 1922 in constructing this and other Shriners hospitals located on the North American continent.
