Student test scores declining; state high school students below nation in basic skills

Top education officials in Kentucky are in Washington this week to lobby the United States Office of Education (USOE) staff up to date about how the state is faring in the national tests.

The meetings were part of a series of observations designed to get state and federal education leaders talking to each other about their local efforts affecting the child in the classroom.

Several of Kentucky's top officials in the Department of Education reported on programs that are currently of interest to Keanthians.

Dr. Donald Van Fleet, director of the Office of Research and Planning for the Kentucky Department of Education, reported on a study recently completed on Kentucky's standard test scores. The study, requested by the legislature, was aimed at discovering why test scores are declining.

"We found that Kentucky test scores have not declined at the rate they have been declining nationally," Dr. Van Fleet said. "Kentucky is really holding its own."

While high school students are not at the national norm in basic skills, fourth graders are at and above the national norm, he told USOE. "We think we're the Times Creek Recreation Center, Lexington, on Thursday, Oct. 13, 10 a.m.-12 noon. William Kenton, Speaker of the House of Representatives, will provide the principal address at this meeting.

These Workshops are being held in cooperation with the several Area Development Districts and those responsible for coordinating these meetings are: Louisville, Dr. Martin Parley; Covington, Mr. Lee Northcutt; Morehead, Mr. James Templeton; and Lexington, Mr. Jack Reeves. All meetings are open to the public.

Teen drinking survey discussed

RICHMOND—Jerry L. Leber, coordinator for Eastern Kentucky University's Traffic Safety Institute, told a press conference gathering recently that he would like "non-drinking" to be viewed as normal among high school age youth.

A recent survey conducted by the Traffic Safety Institute revealed that 67 percent of Kentucky teenagers indicated they drink alcoholic beverages at least once while over 10 percent said they consume alcohol from once a week to daily.

"It seems that in today's society drinking among youth is considered as normal," said Leber. He explained that peer group pressure and a more permissive society lead teenagers to drink. "I would hope this project convinces teenagers that it is okay not to drink and that not drinking is normal."

Also commenting on the EKU project was George Logan, consultant on driver education and safety for the State Department of Education, who feels that driver education instructors in Kentucky are doing a good job in curbing the teenage drinking and driving problem.

To justify his opinion, Logan cited some figures to show the highway death rate in the state is decreasing. "In 1975," he said, "the death rate for 10 million miles of highway driving in Kentucky was 2.3 per cent. In 1973 the figure was 2.3 which was 1.1 percent under the national average."

"When youths see examples of parents and adults who drink, it is hard for educators to convince youths not to drink," he concluded.

Highlighting the press conference was the first showing of a 30-minute film titled "Dialogue About Drinking," which was produced by the Traffic Safety Institute.

The film was developed from funds authorized by the Office of Highway Safety Programs in Frankfurt as part of a federal project called Youth, Alcohol and Traffic Safety. Utilizing a California filming company, the film will be used as an educational counter-measure to curb the incidence of teenage alcohol-related automobile crashes.

Leber said a proposal has been made to the Office of Highway Safety Programs to provide funding for a follow-up phase. During the coming year the film along with brochures, a teacher's guide and other educational materials will be distributed to each Kentucky high school insuring that each high school student in the state will be exposed to realities of the teenage drinking problem.

Also attending the press briefing were Fred Schultz, deputy superintendent for the Department of Education; Henry Mathett, transportation safety coordinator, Office of Highway Safety Programs, and Richard Carlton, a contributor to the EKU project.

making progress and we attribute much of the success to Title I (compensatory education) programs implemented in the elementary grades in reading and math.

"We need now to take a look at what is happening in the middle and high schools," he said.

The timetable for implementing the federal Education of All Handicapped Children Act is unrealistic, according to Stella Edwards, assistant superintendent of the Bureau of Education for Exceptional Children.

Despite that fact, Kentucky is working to implement the law. "In that we have a lawsuit and a consent agreement, which guarantees a due process for the rights of parents and local school districts, Kentucky is running ahead of most states," she said.

"Parents have to be involved at every step of the way," Dr. Edwards emphasized. "Handicapped children should be involved in regular instructional programs," she said.

Despite a surplus of teachers in many areas, rural Kentucky still has a hard time getting all the people it needs in the schools, according to Randy Kimbrough, assistant superintendent of the Bureau of Instruction.

While some teaching fields such as social studies or English offer a surplus of teachers, "In some specialized areas, particularly exceptional children's programs, mathematics, chemistry and foreign languages, there is not an over-abundance of teachers," she said.

"Scholars in metropolitan areas in Kentucky are more attractive than they are in some of the less heavily populated areas," Kimbrough said.

Billy Howard, assistant superintendent of the Bureau for Vocational Education, spoke of the difficulty vocational teachers have in keeping pace with the rapid changes in technology.

Ideally, he explained, in order to keep teachers up-to-date, they should get back into industry on a scheduled basis to keep abreast of technological changes.

The bureau's Staff Exchange Project helps teachers do that. Bureau personnel make contacts with industries and businesses in Kentucky to make arrangements for teachers to spend a period of time where they can concentrate on those things that will be helpful when they come back to the classroom," Howard said.

Tobacco companies oppose loose-leaf

Philip Morris, Inc., has joined with other major burley tobacco manufacturers and buyers in announcing they will not buy loose-leaf or "vapour-mental packages" of tobacco if any is offered at auction this fall.

Two other major companies, R.J. Reynolds and Lorillard, plus about 15 dealers, had gone on record earlier as opposed to changes from the conventional hand-leaf offerings.

Philip Morris agreed with the stand of the Council for Burley Tobacco that the experimental packaging might endanger the farmers' tobacco program of production control and price support.

Lorillard spokesmen had based their opposition on the grounds that marketing in either loose or airtight would result in a lower quality product, while Reynolds found "the present system of marketing burley in bundles is satisfactory."

Last month the Council for Burley Tobacco voted 11 to six to recommend ending the loose-leaf experiments because "such marketing is not in the best interest of the grower and would prove detrimental to a successful price-support program."

Fifteen dealers supplying the domestic and export trade had appealed to the Council and to the Burley Tobacco Growers Cooperative Association to register their opposition. They sent telegrams and letters favoring the traditional hand-leaf bundles, and urged that further efforts to convert to loose-leaf be dropped.
