Lennart Skibstrup, (left) a student from Copenhagen, Denmark, is shown receiving the deed to a "small" Kentucky horse farm from Wendell P. Butler, secretary of the Education and Arts Cabinet. The deed conveys the title of a one inch square of land to the Dane. Skibstrup, who is a student in a school comparable to American colleges, is visiting the United States as part of an exchange program sponsored by the Rotary Club. He said that 102 students from 22 countries are in the program, and the purpose of their stay is to study "not only the educational, but also the social side of U. S. life".

Ted Crowell, the fisheries biologist in charge of black bass research for the Kentucky Department of Fish and Wildlife Resources, spends every Friday giving away money.

Friday is the day Crowell sets aside for processing the tags anglers have returned to him. These tags, which were attached to bass, are worth money and Crowell spends most of the day matching tag numbers with dollar amounts and seeing that checks are written and mailed.

And how much is a bass worth? Well, just ask Roger Coffey. This lucky Valley Station angler caught three tagged bass, two of which were worth $1 each. However, the third fish netted Coffey an even $1,000 — the maximum "reward".

So far, nine other fishermen have caught $50 bass and five have received $100 each for returned tags, Crowell said. Other tags are worth $5, $10 or $25 each.

To date, over $3,800 has been rewarded for 455 returned tags, and Crowell considers it money well spent. "The overall return rate is 17.6 per cent," he says, "and the program has really just started."

In other tagging studies, researchers consider themselves lucky to get a five per cent return at the end of the project.

"Every person who fishes for bass is potentially a paid member of our research team," Crowell says, adding that a high rate of returned tags will provide biological information that very likely could not be otherwise obtained — at any price.

The primary purpose of the study is to measure the impact of fishing pressure placed on bass in various bodies of water—large impoundments, smaller lakes, streams and even a portion of the Ohio River. Over 2,500 bass were tagged this spring in the study waters. Fisheries officials did not announce either the names of the waters (except that some were tagged in the Ohio River) or how many tags were assigned to each dollar value.

"We want fishing pressure and other factors to be as nearly normal as possible," Crowell says. "If we announced that there were $1,000 bass swimming around in a certain lake, conditions very likely would not remain normal for long."

It's taking from two to three weeks for anglers who submit tags to find out how much their reward will be, Crowell says. The small orange tags, which are attached to the fish's back just behind the dorsal fin, may be returned in one of the special envelopes provided at boat docks or in a regular envelope addressed to the Department of Fish and Wildlife, Frankfort, Ky. 40601.

Remember Last Winter?

. . .When the snow piled so high you couldn't find the car in your driveway, much less, dig it out.

. . .And the cold. . .the terrible, biting cold!

All you could do was watch the icicles hanging from your roof, growing larger by the day.

Not many of us were as warm as we wanted to be, but if your home was unusually drafty at the recommended 68 degrees, it may have needed more insulation.

Matter of fact, most homes only a few years old are underinsulated. Adding extra insulation under floors, in walls and the attic certainly comes in handy when you need protection against the weather.

Don't wait until a blizzard strikes to dig out those insulation materials. Now is the time to evaluate your home's energy efficiency and insulate.
