Dear Debbie

Letters to DEBORAH WHITE

DEAR DEBBIE:

I have been married 12 years and have two kids, a boy 10 and a girl 9. Around a year ago my wife got wrapped up in feminine consciousness and started calling me a male chauvinist pig. Okay, so I tried to take it all as good naturedly as possible. I asked her how I can change and how we can make our relationship more fair to use her word. I pay for and support and encourage her return to college so she can have a real career. I cook three nights a week, help with the dishes and with the house cleaning. I have tried to see the situation from her point of view almost to where at times I feel she hasn't been fair to me. I do feel hurt when she calls me a male chauvinist pig. I'd like to know what a man is supposed to do today to escape that image.

FRANK

DEAR FRANK:

Although I am sure your efforts are appreciated, there are probably still a hundred different unconscious things you do which still indicate that you see your wife in a subservient role. Women have had the short end of the stick so long and in so many different ways they are often still unaware of the exploitation they are subject to. Your wife has, as a woman, been patient with the unfairness of her position for many years; you have been working at changing her for one year and you're impatient with how long it's taking your wife to change her attitude? Think about it.

* * *

DEAR DEBBIE:

My 18-year-old kid sister is running around with a man who can only bring disgrace to her and our family. Everyone knows that this man is married and besides that he has a reputation as a womanizer. I have sat down with her along with my husband and we told her everything we knew about him. She refused to believe us and even hinted that if it's true it only makes her affair that much more adventuresome. She claims that he loves her and treats her fine and that's really all that matters. We know that in the end she will be terribly hurt and we have no choice but to accept that, but our greatest fear is that the relationship will drag on for years ruining my sister's youth and probably hurting hers chances of meeting somebody decent later on. Is there anything we can do to put an end to this fiasco?

JENNIFER

DEAR DENNIFER:

You've already done just about everything you reasonably could under the circumstances. Your sister is a big girl, at least legally, and she can and will decide what she is going to do with her life. Although it's painful for you, try to remember that at this point it's harder you push in one direction the harder she'll move in the opposite direction. Your sister is probably not a dummy, and if this man is what you say he is, sooner or later his true colors will come out. At that point —unless she's a masochist —she may be hurt, but she will probably send him packing and eventually get on with her life.
