One's job could be harmful to his health

by Dr. Jerry Howell
Director of Environmental Studies
Morehead State University

It has long been known that cancer can be environmentally induced. One exposure source receiving much attention today is the work environment because several hundred occupational carcinogens have been found and recorded.

According to Drs. Paul and Anne Ehrlich and Dr. John P. Holdren, in their book, "Ecoscience," the degree or risk associated with occupational exposure to carcinogens can be spectacular. At one coal tar dye plant, operating between 1932 and 1962, 100 of the 368 workers employed during those years developed bladder cancer. A director correlation also exists between cigarette-related chemical industries in the U. S. and excessive rates of bladder, lung, liver, and certain other cancers.

Vinyl chloride (VC), a component of polyvinyl chloride (PVC), is a common chlorinated hydrocarbon used in many industries, especially plastic and rubber manufacturing companies. An estimated 70,000 U. S. workers are employed in plants manufacturing VC and PVC and millions of others work in plants where the two chemicals are used. PVC is also found almost everywhere, including in records, boots, plastic film and wrapping paper, pipe, insulation and other common household articles. About one-third of humanity is exposed to PVC each day.

Both chemicals have been shown to be carcinogenic. They also represent a 12 billion dollar industry in the U. S. and it is not surprising that industries associated with the chemicals were reluctant to install expensive monitoring and protective equipment in their manufacturing plants, even after some workers were stricken with a rare form of liver cancer, angiosarcoma. Possible dangers to people exposed to PVC in its finished form have not been established, although there is some concern about this possibility, especially when constant contact over a period of years is common.

There are many other chemicals implicated in occupational cancer. Among them are asbestos, arsenic, nitrosamines, some hormones, some forms of radiation, some pesticides, and some food additives, such as cyclamates, red dye number two, and saccharine.

One of the problems in all these cases is that the public and government seem to be willing to allow workers to be exposed to higher levels of these chemicals than the "man on the street". Only lately has this attitude changed as some federal agencies, such as the Environmental Protection Agency and the Occupational Safety and Health Administration, are beginning to limit worker workplace exposure. Next: epidemiology and the environment.
