HENRY CLAY: KENTUCKY'S GREAT PACIFICATOR

by JUD NEACE

Although Henry Clay, "The Great Pacificator," served his country and state for more than 50 years as a state representative, U.S. Representative and Senator, he never attained his highest dream, that of the Presidency.

However, he was not one to give up easily. Some historians have blamed his repeated defeats on the fact that he was too well known, since voters identified him with so many issues and thus reacted unfavorably as well as otherwise. Also, Clay's opponents were often military men whose success on the battlefield was often appreciated more than victory in scuffling political squabbles.

Clay may have suffered a loss at the polls, but never in the hearts of fellow Kentuckians. Following his third attempt at the Presidency, his beloved hick mansion in Lexington, on the estate he called Ashland, was heavily mortgaged to pay campaign expenses. Anonymous donations kept Clay debt-free.

And Clay loved his fellow Kentuckians. He was angry with Andrew Jackson for calling Kentuckians "cowards" at the Battle of New Orleans. True, the Kentuckians under General Morgan had fallen back before the enemy, but a majority of them were armed only with sticks and flints.

Even though the Americans won the battle, Jackson berated the Kentuckians. A War Department court of inquiry cleared the Kentuckians, the blame directed on their commanding officer, who was declared incompetent and had no

United States as a slave-holding power would ease the balance between slave and free states. A line on Missouri's southern border was drawn across the continent with the understanding that all territories later admitted to the Union above that mark would be free and all below would be slave states.

Although Clay owned slaves, through marriage and inheritance, he opposed slavery. He provided in his will for his slaves to be emancipated and sent to the new African colony of Liberia.

Clay was a member of the "War Hawks," a group that favored battle with England at a time when the British were sagrantly seizing American vessels and sailors. Yet he also later was sent by Congress to negotiate a settlement of the War of 1812, in the Treaty of Ghent.

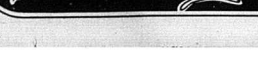

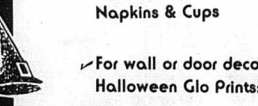

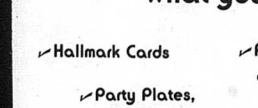

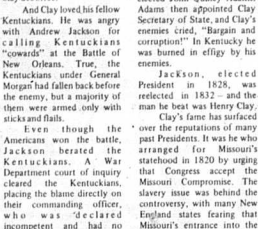

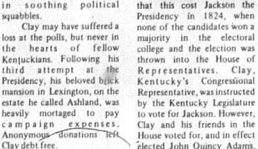

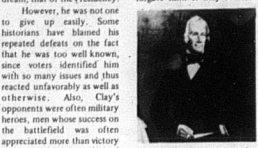

While territorial divisions were emerging in the 1840s that would eventually lead to the Civil War, Clay became indignant when someone spoke of "allegiance to the South."

"I know no South, no North, no East, no West to which I owe allegiance. I owe no responsibility but to my own conscience and to God," he said.

Clay helped to keep the Union together in the face of division over the issue of slavery with the Compromise of 1850. However, battle lines were taking shape and in 1861 the conflict burst into flames.

One of the greatest orators ever produced by this country, he stated, "Disunion by armed forces is treason. If my own state should raise the standard of disunion, I would go against her. I would go against Kentucky — much as I love her."

Clay never had to make that decision, nor was he forced to observe his beloved state pulled apart by the Civil War. He died June 29, 1852, in Washington, but the body was ceremoniously returned to Kentucky for burial in the Lexington Cemetery. A monument was erected in honor of his years of tireless service.

Miss Michelle Knapke to attend conference

Michelle Knapke of Carlisle is one of 18 Kentucky 4-H members who will participate in the Kentucky Foodarama Youth Conference in Louisville this weekend, Oct. 18-21.

When delegates return home, they become spokesmen in their communities for the dynamic food industry. They are prepared to tell the "true" food story in local newspapers, on radio and t.v. programs, in public before civic organizations and business groups, and at school convocations.

From those attending the Kentucky conference, delegates will be selected to attend a national youth leadership conference next spring.

Kentucky's Foodarama committee for planning and conducting the program is made up of representatives from the University of Kentucky College of Agriculture and Home Economics, the Cooperative Extension Service, the Kentucky Department of Education and the food industry. The Conference is sponsored by business and industry related to foods, and is coordinated by the Kentucky Farm Bureau.

Anna Lucas, UK Extension program specialist for 4-H, says the Foodarama conference points out that the food story "from farm to table" is important to everyone in the state, and emphasizes to teenagers that "food is the key to your future." Nutritionally balanced diets have an important effect on physical fitness, health, complexion, personality, grades, beauty and sports ability.

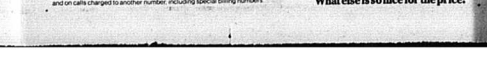

For the food industry, reaching teenagers is vital. It is estimated that by 1985, about half of the population will be under 25 years of age.
