Radiation

many scientists insist that no radiation level is harmless, and that ionizing radiation is something to avoid if at all possible.

When emissions from radioactive substances enter the human body, they injure cells by ionizing (tearing electrons from) atoms. If the damage is slight, or takes place slowly, the body usually makes repairs. But if damage is great, adequate repairs are impossible and the biological consequences can be severe.

Some of the more extreme consequences are illness, reduced life expectancy, eventual cancer. Or genetic defects may appear in future generations.

Certain parts of the body, such as the gonads, thyroid, and bone marrow, are especially sensitive to radiation. Moreover, some radioisotopes have particular affinities. Strontium 90, for example, is a bone seeker, and iodine becomes concentrated in the thyroid instead of being eliminated.
