A disaster

A paragraph in a front page article in the Mercury two weeks ago may have slipped by many readers but its importance far surpasses the space given it.

The article about the flood of three weeks ago mentioned that crop damage to the Nicholas County tobacco crop may eventually amount to a 45 to 50 per cent destruction of this year's crop.

That's a devastating prediction for a county that relies so much on the yearly proceeds from its tobacco crop. What will it mean? Generally speaking, Nicholas County farmers, taken as a whole, will receive about half the money this year for the total crop as was realized last year.

This loss will reflect itself in many ways. It will be felt by Carlisle merchants, who may see a drop in business this December as compared with last year. But more importantly, it will affect the growers themselves, whose small farms and working families make up the backbone of Nicholas County.

In turn, the loss will be felt by surrounding counties, where many Nicholas farmers sell their tobacco. It will be felt at the warehouses, in the stores, in the new car showrooms and in many other places.

Some of the loss can be made up next year, but it will never fully be regained. The loss will be felt hardest in the Saltwell-Headquarters area although many other areas of the county experienced the damage.

The destruction of half of the 1979 tobacco crop shows just how dependent the farmer is on good weather. In many cases, the only level ground where these farmers could grow their crop was along the creek bottoms. They had to gamble, as they have every year. This year, due to an unforeseen natural disaster, some of them lost. They have our sympathy and our offer of assistance in whatever way we can help. As the farmer goes, so goes Nicholas and this season, some are not going very well.

Spending limit needed

By S.C. Von Curon

The Fancy Farm Picnic in Graves County last weekend set off the gubernatorial race between Republican Louie B. Nunn and Democrat John Y. Brown Jr. in traditional fashion — a lot of people eating a lot of good West Kentucky barbecue listening to a lot of political speeches.

While there were no real surprises at Fancy Farm — the speeches were pretty much the same ones Nunn and Brown had used during their primary races — First District Congressman Carroll Hubbard announced a proposal that deserves attention.

Next August will mark the 100th time Kentucky's political leaders and candidates have traveled to the St. Jerome Catholic School for the traditional campaign sendoff, and Hubbard wants the Democrat and Republican nominees for president in 1980 to appear on the bunting-draped flatbed truck at Fancy Farm in honor of the picnic's centennial.

Hubbard, assuming that President Jimmy Carter will be renominated, said he had invited the president to appear at Fancy Farm next year, and had written a letter to the national Republican Party leadership inviting the GOP nominee also.

Not only is this a good idea from the standpoint of the picnic, which is held every year to raise money for community projects, but it also makes good political sense for the presidential candidates as well. After all, the picnic draws more than 10,000 people from throughout Kentucky, many of this state's governmental and political leaders and, maybe most importantly, representatives of Kentucky's print and electronic media.

The one clear problem with Hubbard's proposal is the Democrat nominee. The Democratic National Convention doesn't begin until Aug. 11, and it seems likely that one or more candidates may try to take the nomination away from Carter. If the two presidential candidates are willing to come to Kentucky's premier political event next summer, surely the organizers of the Fancy Farm Picnic would agree to delay it until the last weekend of August.

Let's hope the candidates for president can come to Fancy Farm in 1980, and Congressman Hubbard's idea for celebrating the picnic's 100th anniversary becomes a historic reality.

4 Miles

One of the major disappointments of the 1979 gubernatorial campaign has already occurred. The candidates and their respective staffs were unable — and maybe more than a little unwilling — to reach agreement on a solid campaign spending limitation.

Somehow along the way, the proposal to limit spending in the governor's race became tied to a code of ethics for the candidates, a code that was to be somehow enforced by an independent commission made up of members of Common Cause and the League of Women Voters.

When it came down to crossing t's and dotting i's, however, the code of ethics and spending limit got lost amid disagreements over the extent of the limit and Brown's continued refusal to reveal his income tax returns. The Nunn Campaign insisted on the Brown tax returns being made public, and the two candidates could not agree whether the proposed spending limit of $5.125 million would apply to the gubernatorial race alone (Brown's idea) or to the entire party slate of constitutional candidates (Nunn's proposal.)

Both candidates have more-or-less agreed to abide by the $1.25 million limit, and they say they'll abide by the code of ethics proposed, but there will be no commission to investigate complaints of violations, and the disagreement over putting the limit on one or all constitutional races effectively resolves the question meaningless.

The issue, however, deserves a serious look by the 1980 General Assembly, that ought to consider requiring by law the kind of financial restraints on runaway campaign spending that Nunn and Brown were unable to accept independently.

Some say leaks around the house help keep it from catching fire.

Not every student is a loan defaulter

While the national default rate on student loans soars somewhere between 10 and 13 percent, the Kentucky Department of Agriculture has a program that has maintained less than a 2 percent default rate since it began in 1973.

Glenn Wilson has administered the program since the first loan was approved for a Rowan County student on his way to Morehead State University six years ago. Since that time, 254 other loans have been made. Only four students have neglected their payments or filed for bankruptcy.

"I was the only representatives at the national meeting last year without a single delinquency," Wilson said. "All kinds of things can happen in the lending business, and our success far exceeds my expectations."

Wilson said he won't approve a loan until he has had "eyeball to eyeball" contact with the applicant. He talks easily of past and present students in the program, their college majors and current occupations.

"One girl considered going on to medical school but wasn't sure she could handle the time and effort required," he said. She majored in animal science, got her master's in biochemistry and eventually secured a commission in the Navy. I heard from her not too long ago and she was on her way to Iceland."

Although students are required to come from a rural farming background to be eligible for these loans, they are not required to pursue a similar career after attending college.

"I don't think students should be restricted in their career choices," Wilson said. "We have students who majored in dentistry and chemical and electrical engineering, and three students graduated from veterinary school this past spring." Nearly two-thirds of the students have selected agricultural areas, he pointed out.

Roger Tharp, deputy director of loan programs for the Kentucky Higher Education Assistance Authority (KHEAA), agrees that Wilson maintains a unique lending program because of the care that is taken to interview applicants.

Recommendations are submitted to Wilson by a rural rehabilitation committee in each county. The committee includes a Farmers Home Administration county supervisor who serves as chairman, a vocational agricultural teacher and the county superintendent of schools.

"These people generally know the student and his or her family," Tharp said. "They know how the student is regarded throughout the community and something about his school records. I think this technique helps keep the default rate down."

To be eligible, students must be Kentucky residents, have been accepted to an institution that has been approved by the federal education department and carry at least half the hours required by a full-time student. Most importantly, students must come from a farming background and have been unable to secure the same kind of loan from other lending institutions.

Students may borrow up to $2,500 per academic year or up to $7,500 while attending under graduate school. Graduate students are eligible for $5,000 per year, up to a $15,000 total.

The average amount requested for loans in 1978 was $2,000 per year per student, which is double the average when the program began in 1973.

The loans are issued from fixed fund of federally granted and controlled money at a 7 percent interest rate. The fund was established in 1934, but a corporation administering the money failed to use the funds.

Initially, loans were insured by the federal government but now that job is handled by the KHEAA. Tharp said when the federal government encouraged states to adopt their own insurance programs. Gov. Julian Carroll and the 1978 General Assembly initiated Kentucky's programs, which includes the agricultural loans.

Under the KHEAA program, the insurance rate for student loans increased from one-fourth of one percent to one percent. However, Tharp doesn't think the increase will deter students from applying for the loans.

Another difference between the federal and state programs is a reduction in the grace period after the student leaves school. The federally insured loan allowed a full year before payments began. The KHEAA program allows nine months. Wilson said students holding loans under different grace periods will be set up on a payment schedule that accounts for the difference.

Wilson said students using the agriculture program are "a pretty good character of youth."

While about 10 percent continued on to graduate school, only about six of 10 requested additional financial assistance, he added.

Though students who have used the agricultural loans have attended a variety of out-of-state schools, Wilson said the vast majority have selected schools in Kentucky and remained in the state following graduation.

Early in life she resolved she'd "call no man master," and it was a telling comment on the fate of women in the mid-1800s who married. She was an emotional lecturer on the subjects of abolition and suffrage, and her low-voiced tirades often aroused violence in those who disagreed with her. At the age of 37, she agreed to marry Henry Blackwell who espoused her causes, but as a symbolic gesture, she refused to change her name to his. Her name has since been used as a term for women who opt to retain their maiden names after marriage. Who was that lady? Lucy Stone
