'Brand X' foods are getting popular

WASHINGTON - A new tactic being adopted by food retailers... is the introduction of "generic" or "unbranded" products.

Most stores carry 25 to 50. Many carry more than 40 or 50 items and they generally carry only one size.

Handy said retailers agreed the generic foods was USDA grade C, with some grade B to fill in as needed.

Reduced Prices While generic foods have spread rapidly, they still aren't available to many shoppers.

While the whole price difference between grade C and grades B and A is a major source of savings, grade C products are acceptable quality for standard consumer table and cooking use.

Kentucky has more forest land than any other kind

Kentucky is known as the Bluegrass State, but more of its land is covered by forests than by any other type of growth.

The increase, according to the survey, has been "small but steady" since 1949.

As the forest changes over the next 25 years, some differences in species composition may occur.
