

Black Sheep win leadership posts

who had to fill their daily chores. Unlike the days when the governor-elect took a strong hand in choosing the leadership, the candidates and their supporters had to fend for themselves.

Newsman always had a source close to the governor-elect to guide them on their stories about who the prospective leaders were likely to be.

The governor-elect always had a pacification home to throw to the press. This situation was not present this time.

The campaign process got brutal and bitter before the Tuesday morning voting of all parties for their leadership.

Veteran legislators with key committee posts were threatened with being stripped of these posts if they didn't go along with the winning faction for Democrat leadership posts. This attitude did not prevail among the minority Republicans.

An early news story from the conference that Gov. Julian Carroll and former Party Chairman J.R. Miller were interfering in the leadership selection could not be verified by the majority of the press at the conference. I tried hard but I could find no proof.

What interference came from the outside came from some of the lobbyists. They are always interested in who holds the leadership posts.

The fact that the 1978 rebel faction in the Senate won the top leadership posts leaves a lot of room for speculation, but it would be unwise to do so at this time. Between now and the beginning of the session in January, there is a lot of time to heal any wounds that may have developed over the leadership fight.

It is best to take a wait-and-see attitude. It would be pure speculation to hand down a diagnosis at this time.

However, there is room for a cat-and-dog fight during the session unless some of these wounds are healed.

Legislators should bear in mind their job is to do the best for Kentucky and work with the governor toward this end. We have only one governor at a time, and all should cooperate to make him the best possible.

Commerce has toll-free number

The State Department of Commerce small and minority business development division now has an available, toll-free telephone number.
The number, 800-973-7162, is for the use of any prospective or operating small and minority business in the state.
Floyd Taylor, director of the small and minority business development division, formerly by the office of minority business enterprise, said the purpose of the toll-free number is to help these businesses gain access to the governmental agencies that can help solve their problems.

School news

Blue Grass visit
By Mary Ann Hollar
On Monday, Nov. 5, 1979 Mrs. Wilson's sixth grade reading class visited Blue Grass Industries. We were driven there in a school bus.
After we entered the factory we were taken by Miss Pat Allison on a tour, first to the cutting department, where we saw the lay up, cut out, and the tying up of the garments.
Then we were taken down the strict line where my Mom is supervisor. We then saw the pressing, folding and packaging of the suits.
Everyone had a wonderful time and enjoyed it very much. I even picked out the job I want when I get old enough to work at Blue Grass.

4-H news

By Gary Steele
The sixth grade 4-H club had its first meeting Nov. 12. We had a vote of name in Hot Stuff.
Allison, Bill Irvin, Kyla Soupe, Angie Buckner, Cammie Clark, Amy Feedback and others helped in the singing.
We sang a lot of songs. Everyone had fun. There were 30 in attendance.

Name omitted

The name of Tracy Tolliver was omitted from the Nicholas County High School honor roll published in last week's Mercury.
