Agree or not

Another controversial bill, or two I should say, involves local option on alcoholic beverages.

Bowling Green had a situation where the city voted wet and the county remained dry in a local option election.

Bowling Green has been a growing city. It annexed a large development of motels and businesses along 140 at the edge of the city. Liquor licenses were issued about 12 years ago and the businesses have been operating. However, the question was brought up that the area was originally dry before the city annexed it. A bill was passed to make the area wet. It was euphemistically known as legislative balls as the Bowling Green Industrial Development Bill.

Another similar issue involves the city of Ashland. The city has a long record of voting dry. However, Ohio, just across the river in wet Ashland residents drive across the river to shop and buy their alcoholic beverages. Two saw months over at Ironton have drafted up the local model business plan.

Businessmen and industrial leaders in Ashland say the situation is gradually killing their area. They would like alcoholic beverages to be legal in at least a part of Ashland.

The present law says a city or county must be voted wet by a unit.

But it also says an area may be voted dry by precinct.

The bill passed for Ashland merely permits the citizens of a precinct to vote it wet. It's a bill leaving the decision to the people. State government isn't forcing anything on the people of Ashland.

These are emotional issues that always draw a lot of legislative maneuvering.
