
OUTDOOR LORE

by Hoyle Shackelford

UNIVERSITY OF KENTUCKY • COLLEGE OF AGRICULTURE

If there is anything in the world that will distract a springtime gardener from his appointed tasks—especially a gardener with a country upbringing, it's the sight of a big fat earthworm squirming in the soil he has just turned up with his dibble or spade.

The sight of this lowly, pink-skinned creature reminds him most vividly of some half-forgotten fishing hole filled with plump creek chubs, redeyes and sassy sunfish—unsophisticated little fishes he used to catch on unsophisticated angling equipment consisting of a cane pole, twine string line and a bent pin hook baited with a fishworm. For most erstwhile country boys, seeing this happy little earth dweller brings back a flood of happy memories and tempts him to throw down his garden tools, snatch up the worm and a can full of its kinfolks and high-tail it for the nearest farm pond or creek where fishes gather.

Aside from being good fish-bait, the earthworm is a great soil builder and conservationist. Its castings builds up the topsoil, adds to its fertility and plays a part in erosion control. Being harder than the surrounding soil, the castings are more resistant to falling raindrops and spread across the surface of bare earth, they help control run-off before grasses or other plants appear to take over that duty. The burrows of earthworms also help render the soil more porous and puts it in better condition to receive air and moisture.

When he was a young student in Edinburgh, Charles Darwin began studying the work of earthworms, counting the number of holes in measured areas, weighing the castings brought up on sample square yards and estimating the number of leaves they hauled down their burrows. With his characteristic patience he continued the study all his life and in his book on the study, he stated that earthworms have made the bulk of all the fertile soil on earth.

Among his earthworm statistics are these unusual facts. In an acre of British soil, there are on an average 53,000 earthworms and in fine fallow ground there may be a half million. Orran average. 10 tons per acre per year of soil and vegetation pass through their bodies. With their castings, they cover the surface at the rate of three inches every 15 years.

In further comment. Darwin wrote that the plow, as an instrument of cultivation, was one of the oldest and most valuable of man's inventions; but long before he existed, the land was being cultivated by earthworms. It is doubtful, he continued, whether any other creature played a more important role in the geologic history of the earth. Without worms, the earth would soon become cold, hard-bound, void of fermentation and consequently sterile.

some real news:

Carlisle native W.B. Griffin will be featured on Eastern Kentucky University's radio station, WEKU-FM, on March 12 at 7 p.m. and March 14 at 12:30 p.m.

Mr. Griffin will discuss his circus experiences and his collection of band music and marches with Ron W. Smith, producer. WEKU-FM's dial position is 88.9 and operates on 50,000 watts of radiated power. Also to be featured in the program will be several portions of rare musical recordings.

Stung

As I approached NCHS the other day to take a picture Supt. Don Elder called to Principal David McMillan; "Don't let him enroll." The remark was in reference to the Lexington television reporter who enrolled in a Fayette County high school to do an undercover story.

Elder relented after a minute but said if I enrolled I'd have to shave my beard. That chilled it as far as I was concerned, But I remember working for a metropolitan newspaper a few years ago that came up with the same idea involving me. Why me, I'll never know. I guess my 29 years of clean living have left me with a countenance unscarred by toil or trouble and I looked young enough then to pass for a high schooler, minus my chinwarmer, of course.

Well, I wasn't interested. Heck, it took me long enough to get through high school in the first place. I told my boss I'd rather cover the women's clubs than have to sit through high school chemistry again.

Extended phone service is subject of meeting

The state Utility Regulatory Commission will hold a hearing March 5 to receive testimony on extended area telephone service. After considering the testimony, the commission may decide whether or not to adopt guidelines or procedures to handle requests for the service.

The commission has received numerous requests from telephone subscribers who want the service. It allows a customer to call toll-free to an exchange outside of their local calling area.

The hearing will be held at 9:30 a.m. in the commission's office on Schenkel Lane in Frankfort.
