The 344 members on whether the state - prompted by the state of the economy in which both sides are hurting. These new signs of consolidation surely didn't escape Kruger's attention.

As a result, there will be no new payrolls, no investment for Kentucky.

Because of the market volatility during the last several weeks on Kentucky stock prices, Kruger said he is not optimistic either way on the "...."

The Northern Kentucky area got an early Christmas present this month when the Kruger Co. announced its intention to locate a new, $110 million research and development center adjacent to Northern Kentucky University in Highland Heights.

While this latest announcement brought holiday cheer to Northern Kentucky, it's just the latest of four major development projects Kruger has announced in the region since 1981.

Earlier this year, Kruger opened a specialty bakery plant in Bowling Green, gave Winchester's industrial park its first tenant with a milk processing facility and announced it will locate a general, drink mix and salad nut processing plant in Murray.

The four projects together will add as many as 800 full-time jobs for Kentucky workers. Total investment by Kruger has reached about $60 million.

What makes this all remarkable is that until this year Kruger has never had a retail store and a remarkable is that until this year Kruger has never had a retail store.

It signals a definite shift southward by the food company, a trend also seen in location of the chairman's new home.

Company officials will not talk publicly about all the reasons for this strategy, but it is clear that labor difficulties have been involved in the decisions. That was one potential obstacle for the company in Kentucky as well.

Currently, the KRA is surveying all new state highway and old Crooked Creek Turnpike, to John M. Keith Jr., Trustee, deed to land on waters of Crooked Creek on new state highway.

But, Turner, it wasn't just the question of union or non-union labor "but just the labor climate in general." Labor troubles, in fact, were part of what led to the eventual demise of the Tappan project.

But observers of the Kentucky labor management effort in the state are in evidence of heightened cooperation among organized labor and management.
