This, That and T'other

And row it comes again, this lonesome familiar call, from the dry and dressing vision of reashly turned furrows and the odor of the good earth, green selds of the willows, valiant thrust of the lity snowdrop, greening fields, drone of early the sound of the lity snowdrop, greening fields, drone of early the rob but and the first-heard carrol of a meadow lark drifting down the wind. Sir Robin of the burnished breast is forme a very magletan, when list call nonces making audible for a moment the soft, distant footlad or returning spring, while yet we draw coaily to roaring firred and though snow may fly and ity winds may breat be readily and the spring, of the setting in of the vernal tides. Ever carrolling from the bit of ity vinds, but ever advancing, till curve of swallow wing heralds its near approach and the lovely, liquid vesper song of a calbrid marks the highlide of another spring. Today the cathins of the pushwillow pring of a calbrid marks the highlide of another spring.

Today the catkins of the pussywillow show like tiny silver spears and the golden sheen of the weeping willows in my gad region with this tree casts about itself when all others yet rattle their bare branches of tight-wrapped buds. How vigorously alive is that Nature, which a scant tendays ago was wrapped in its winding sheet of ice and snow — grey, dead, lifeless to human eyes—but under bark and boxl, down in the dark earth life palsed, tense, waiting for the gentle whisper; the warm breath that calls to resurrection and certainty of unfailment, this incovable readiness for the return of the life giving tides of spring? For me, at least, this service and the state of the first of the life state of the state of the life state of the state of the
