We must now look to our government officials for ambulance service

It has come to our attention that our local morticians have been the object of more than one questioning. Nicholas Countian since they announced their decision to discontinue private ambulance service at the end of this year. Such questions are to be expected, though it seems they are aimed at the wrong persons.

We too, wonder, "What will we do for ambulance service after December 31?" But is a question that needs to be addressed not to the local morticians, but rather to our local political officials, our mayor, our council, our county judge/executive, our magistrates, etc. For the ball is now in their hands.

We regret that this problem has come up. But it's not all that surprising. A look at other counties in the state will show that private funeral homes are getting out of the ambulance business faster than a group of thoroughbred yearlings.

Spokesmen for both of the local funeral homes are getting out of the ambulance business faster than a group of thoroughbred yearlings. In fact, both have stated that they believe the increased state and federal regulation which played a big part in their decision are not all the purely evil conjurations of overly-zealous bureaucrats. In fact, both have stated that the regulations are generally quite beneficial to the quality of care the public receives from ambulance service.

But those regulations require new, expensive equipment and hours of training for licensure. When those costs are added into a situation that has been a money losing proposition for years, the private sector of ambulance service is stretched to the imagination, for their decision to eliminate guaranteed losses.

Without financial support from our local government agencies, our local morticians have provided ambulance services to the public at their own expense for years. But that expense has grown too great. They have no more responsibility to provide such a service at their own expense than any other private business in the county. The association many of us perceive between ambulance service and funeral homes may be traditionally logical, but it is by no means necessary or absolute.

means necessary or absolute.

We sympathize with the tough position the decision has doubtlessly put them in. But they can no more afford out of the pocket losses on such a service (although it is a noble service), than we could provide free advertising space to a plethora of causes (although they be noble causes). We should be appreciative of the years of service the local morticians have given our community. They have served us well, from their pocketbooks, and with their dedicated time.

They are our representatives. It is our money they spend. We must turn to them if we want an ambulance service in our county. For no longer can such a service come from the private sector unaided by government subsidy. It simply will not happen. It is the local governments, not private business, that are eligible for state and federal grants for such projects. It is these governments which have at their sole, sustaining function the protection of the public welfare.

It is certainly no sin to begrudge paying taxes for services you do not want. Likewise, it is no sin to refuse to pay taxes for services you do not want. But that certain services you do want be favored over others. Ambulance service for the county is a liberal "liability" every year. With only a few months left before there is no longer an ambulance service in the county, we turn to our local governing bodies and ask, along with all Nicholas Countians, "What are we going to do?... What are you going to do?"

The 'cat and rat' farm idea still smells a little fishy

By S.C. Van Curen
This column will pursue the idea discussed last week for refunding the Kentucky Turnpike Authority's plan to refund the state's $621 million in state bonds.

Transportation Secretary Frank Metz contends the state can refund refunding bonds; use the money to purchase Federal Securities at sufficient higher interest rates to pay off holders of the state's refunding bonds and still make a profit of $10.8 million.

Last week this was called "Cat and Rat Farm" idea. This theory is that there are no operating costs. The cats eat the rats. The cats are killed and skinned. The carcasses of the cats are fed to the rats. Therefore there is no food costs for the rats or the cats. The cats' hides are sold to make the profit, all clear.

The state's refunding bonds are tax free, both federal and state, to the purchasers. If they making them very attractive.

Individual purchasers of Treasury notes and certificates of deposit must pay federal income taxes, but not state, on the earned interest. Therefore, tax free state bonds are sometimes more attractive to persons with large incomes.

U.S. Treasury obligations are issued presently to periods of 30 years, but the state anticipates buying no longer than 10 to 20 years. Therefore, the maturity dates to coincide with the maturity dates of the refunding bonds.

When this is done, the state then plans to issue an additional $300 million in industrial development bonds authorized by the 1980 legislature.

The idea is that the liability for the $300 million in present state road bonds outstanding will be transferred to the federal government, thereby wiping the state's state clean to issue the $300 million in new bonds.

This sounds almost too good to be true. Therefore, the opinion marks that draft the bond indentures have a new business opened to them that will make millions.

According to the federal Census Bureau, there were 117,760 millions of dollars of state securities sold for fiscal 1979-1979. These figures were obtained from the Council of state

The Idle Rambler

By James C. Smith
My French professor in college was a constant punner. Yet he was a source of constant amusement for us, his always perplexed students.

He, Dr. Terrence McQuay, gave me one article on the final day of class that made all of the memorization and verb conjugations worth the effort.

What he gave me was a copy of a brief manuscript he had been collecting for years. A former instructor at both Auburn University and the University of Georgia, Dr. McQuay has saved hundreds of little, humorous mistakes he students made on their essay exams.

His manuscript cannot resist putting forth a few examples here. If one is familiar with the literary works discussed, each faux pas will bring an unstoppable smile to your lips. Some of them are absolutely hilarious.

— Prime King of Troy.
— Median Rex: a character trope into the very heart of the matter.
— Odysseus got bored by a wild pig while hunting with his grandfather.

— The scar on Odysseus' foot was also made by a bore.
— Circe offered Odysseus immortality if he would give her the formula for making a man into a pig.
— This the story is unvarnished — des ex marmaca (gods come down in a machine). This method was common in ending Greek poetry.
