

NCHS News

All NCHS students receive their report cards every nine weeks. The first grading period ended Friday, Oct. 23, and for juniors and seniors with those elective English classes, it's on to another class and another challenge.

The new weeks Rob Lane's first period Journalism class has produced the NCHS news for The Mercury. This is the last time these students will produce the news. Melinda Beatty, Lisa O'Neil, Barbara Herrington, Brian Hill, Dolly Hunt, Larry McInab, Kavana Mitchell, Jeff Tidwell, Mike Woolley, Kevin Watson and Angie Sparks.

However, Lane will have another Journalism class next term that will have readers informed about what's happening at NCHS.

Thank you for saying you saw their advertisement in The Carlisle Mercury

Walk-a-thon held Saturday is success

The March of Dimes Walk-a-thon, held here Saturday, was a big success with 53 walkers participating. The total funds raised for the March of Dimes activities such as the Birth Defects Center at the University of Kentucky public health education programs and County Elementary.

The Nicholas County High School students and students from Nicholas County Elementary.

Several students from NCHS involved in study of the social sciences visited the Historical Society's open house at the newly restored depot Friday. The open house featured an exhibition of the R.L. Shannon private collection.

Kentucky Business Scene

(C) 1981, Kentucky Business Ledger, Inc.

Kentucky voters will find two constitutional amendments on the ballot Nov. 3, and the business community of the state is intensely interested in one of them.

It isn't the amendment that deals with various taxation matters, as might be supposed without reading bottom-line types. The one drawing discussion in the business community is the same one that's drawing all the political attention: the so-called succession amendment, which would allow current constitutional office-holders, including Gov. John Y. Brown Jr., to succeed themselves in 1984. It also would allow county sheriffs to run for an unlimited number of terms.

The intriguing thing about business interest in the succession amendment is that the business community is divided in its position. The Kentucky Chamber of Commerce vigorously opposed the ballot issue and is providing staff services for the anti-amendment forces. Yet the Louisville Area Chamber officially supports the amendment, although that chamber's activities have been low-key. No other local chambers are known to have adopted a position contrary to that of the state chamber.

Lots of supporters and opponents of the amendment show a similar view among business leaders. William Glass, president of Louisville Fife activities by the state's small business community, is a vociferous supporter and has engaged in public debate and testimony on television to proclaim that "as an independent businessman, I am suspicious of all concentration of power. I believe I oppose the succession amendment, which would bestow unlimited power upon an already unlimited government."

On the other hand, business leaders publicly listed as supporters of the amendment include such names as Louisville insurance man David Little, Lexington, W.E. Burnett, president of Kentucky Central Life Insurance in Lexington; Bill Butler, president of W.T. Butler in northern Kentucky; Robert of Kentucky bankers, Charles E. Heston of Beattyville and G.B. Johnson of Ashland; and Creosote's businessmen Tom Gryn and David Hocker.

There's no ready explanation to the divergence from party affiliation, either. The Democratic Brown administration, who are leaders of the pro-amendment forces, also draws support from well-known Republicans like Louisville candidate George Clark, a businessman who is running for mayor; and John Yarnall, a magazine publisher running for county commissioner. Marlow Cox, former Republican U.S. Senator from Kentucky, is a co-chairman of the committee promoting passage.

The anti-amendment forces include prominent Democrats, notably former Governor Bert Conde, now an attorney, as well as prominent Republicans like former governor Louie Nunn.

Unlike many ballot issues on which business leaders are commonly united, there's no clear-cut guidance to voters who might wish to vote "pro-business."

Yet to many of those who support or oppose the amendment, the succession issue does have some meaning to the business community. Governor Brown, for one, says it's ridiculous for a corporation to hire a chief executive officer for four years, without renewal and of course he sees the government "as Kentucky & Co."

His opponents say business interests - along with labor interests - would find themselves subjected to a powerful governor who had re-election possibilities and could use those possibilities to extract concessions, issues such as unemployment taxes, workers' compensation, corporate taxation and structure of financial institutions come immediately to mind.

It will be interesting to see how the vote goes on Nov. 3. Among the business community, at least, there are bound to be lots of smiles and lots of frowns, no matter which way it goes.

Bison, often called the American buffalo, have in the past been over-extended in the late 1800s when their numbers dwindled from millions to fewer than 100 in the United States. Through stricter laws and enforcement, there are now some 8,000 bison here and another 10,000 in Canada.
