Solar facility dedicated at Berea

The nation's first all-solar federal building designed with an experimental wood-burning furnace to back up the sun's energy was dedicated last week on Highway 21 East near Berea. Senator Walter D. Huddleston delivered the dedication address.

Following the hour-long ceremony, guests were taken on tours of the building to view its many energy-saving and innovative design features and to learn about the work conducted there. Housed in the new facility are employees of the U.S. Department of Agriculture's Forest Service.

According to Willie Curtis, Forest Service research project leader, most of the building's heating and air conditioning will come from the sun's energy.

"There are 120 solar panels mounted on the roof to collect the solar energy," said Curtis. "The balance of our energy will be supplied from wood-fired boilers with a natural gas back-up system.

"We also have heat exchangers in various places around the laboratory which pick up heat and redistribute it throughout the buildings."

In addition, Curtis pointed out that the earth is built up on three sides of the building to provide some insulation. In effect, 40 percent of the building is underground, he says.

Curtis pointed out many interior energy-saving features. Most of the windows face south, for example, which adds extra warmth on cold winter days.

Skylights illuminate the corridors, lobby, library, and some offices.

"On sunny days," said Curtis, "we don't have to use electric lights at all in those areas."

With the wood-burning furnace, they can also switch entirely to wood energy.

"We plan a study for at least a year in which we will operate largely on wood," said Curtis.

Their purposes will be to test the heat-efficiency of different woods and to determine species' burning characteristics and drying requirements. Wood for the project will come from improvement cuttings conducted on the Berea district of National Boone National Forest.

Kentucky Business Scene

(c) 1981, Kentucky Business Ledger, Inc.

By anybody's standards, an 87 percent response to a survey has to be considered overwhelming.

And just as overwhelming to a recent poll of Kentucky banks was their emphatic NO! to questions about possible changes in state banking structure.

The four-question survey of Kentucky's 344 banks was conducted by the state Legislative Research Commission for a legislative subcommittee that is studying changes it may recommend to the 1982 General Assembly. Responses came from 298 banks, and the results were reported at the third in a series of subcommittee hearings on those proposals, held in Lexington.

Multibank holding companies, which would allow the same company to own two or more banks, got the highest vote in the poll, yet only 90 banks favored such a structure and 193 said no. Of all the proposals under consideration, multibank holding companies offer the best prospects for legislative approval in 1982, according to subcommittee members.

The other three proposals included in the survey were even more firmly rejected by the bankers. Statewide branch banking got only 25 "yes" votes and 261 "no" votes; adjacent-county branch banking received 41 "yes" votes and 240 "no" votes, and branching within regions of the state drew 34 "yes" responses and 245 "no" votes. Each question also drew a handful of "no opinion" responses.

Respondents were not asked to identify their banks or the size of their banks. Yet the sheer one-sidedness of the results under the "one bank, one vote" format is not surprising to some observers; while Kentucky's banking industry has historically opposed such changes in state bank structure, a poll conducted late last year by the Kentucky Bankers Association showed an almost even split on the question of considering a change in that position.

Some insiders had even thought the legislative poll would show banks more willing to consider change now than they were when the Bankers Association poll was conducted. The financial industry has undergone sweeping changes in the past year, and many Kentucky banks consider competitive threats from institutions in other states even more serious than "takeover" threats from sister Kentucky banks.

Kentucky is among the minority of states that do not allow some form of statewide or regionalized banking. Under current state law, banks may have offices only within the county where their home office is located.

Efforts to change that law were last made in 1974 and were soundly rejected. Renewed interest in some form of statewide banking has been spurred by the nationwide changes in the banking business as well as by Gov. John Y. Brown's apparent interest in expanded banking, which he believes fosters economic development.

In addition to the legislative hearings and poll, seminars are being held on statewide banking by such groups as the University of Kentucky's College of Business and Economics (Sept. 28). The topic also will get a thorough airing at the annual convention of the state Bankers Association, to be held Sept. 13-15 in Louisville.

Any change in the law won't come easy. Bankers themselves — traditionally considered a cautious and conservative group — have been known to use strong language on the subject, whichever side of the issue they're on.

But it has been identified by the Legislative Research Commission as one of the key business issues facing the 1982 General Assembly. And that's one thing on which both proponents and opponents of statewide banking agree.

Correction noted

The court record furnished to The Mercury for last week's publication inadvertently omitted an additional sentence handed down to Robert Hogsten in case number 81 M 137.

The additional sentence was for one year in jail, to run concurrently with previously assessed fines. Hogsten pled guilty to possession of a forged instrument in the second degree, and criminal mischief in the third degree. A preliminary charge of arson in the first degree was combined into the criminal mischief charge.

Selective Service to post names

The names of Kentucky men born in 1962 and the first three months of 1963 who are registered with Selective Service have been forwarded to county clerks in their home counties.

These lists of names will be posted in a public place in compliance with the law, according to officials with the federal Selective Service System. Lists of registrants born in 1960 and 1961 will be posted when complete.

Making these lists available to the public is not aimed at encouraging people to seek out young men who haven't complied with the law, explained retired Air Force Brig. Gen. Taylor L. Davidson. Davidson is state director of Selective Service for Kentucky.

The purpose is to fulfill posting requirements of the Military Selective Service Act, he said. However, the publicity surrounding posting of the lists will probably help to make young men aware of their obligation and encourage them to register at their post offices, said Davidson.

The military has not drafted young men for several years, and revitalization of the Selective Service System and registration does not signal a return to the draft, according to a Selective Service news release. President Reagan is "firmly committed to making the all-volunteer force a success," the news release stated.

But peacetime registration will enable the government to have the names of men born in 1960 and later years on a computer. The men could be contacted quickly if Congress declares a national emergency and authorizes a draft. Otherwise, it could take at least four weeks to mobilize U.S. manpower in an emergency.

All men born since Dec. 31, 1959, must register. Men born in 1963 and later should register at their post offices within 30 days before or after their 18th birthday.

Within 30 days before or after his 18th birthday, a young man must go to a U.S. post office and fill out a registration form which asks for his name, address, phone number, social security number and birthdate.

The public lists will include his name, birthdate and Selective Service number but his address and other information won't be included because of the Privacy Act.

To date, nearly six million men have registered. Failure to register is a felony, punishable by a maximum penalty of $10,000 and/or five years in prison.

In addition to the registration of young men, the local draft boards are being reinstituted.

In Kentucky, there will be 37 boards organized under 10 area offices. These replace the 125 boards that existed in the 1960s and early 1970s. The process of choosing representative local board members for nomination to President Reagan is nearing completion.

PSC takes jurisdiction

directed the commission secretary to certify to the Federal Communications Commission that it (the state commission) was not exercising jurisdiction. The FCC fixes pole-attachment rates unless it is informed otherwise by state commissions.

The commission's decision is the result of a case involving several large utilities and cable operators. The utilities, by petitioning the commission, indicated their preference for state regulation and the cable system operators, by opposing the petitions, opted for federal regulation.

The cable operators argued that state law does not give the commission jurisdiction over pole attachments because, they said, the attachments are not a utility service. The utilities, however, said that the attachments are a service as defined in the state statutes.

The commission, in its findings, agreed with the utilities that the attachments are a service within the meaning of the definition given in state law.
