P&G files more lawsuits

The Procter & Gamble Company recently filed suits against four additional individuals for circulating "false and malicious" statements about the company and calling for a boycott of P&G products. These actions are the latest in a series of steps initiated by P&G to stop the spread of stories associating the company with "moons and stars" trademark with satanism and devil worship. The company filed similar suits against a Pensacola, Fla. couple and a Miami, Fla. man on July 1.

Suits were filed against Guy Sharpe of Atlanta; Elma P. Pruitt of Clarksville, New Mexico; and Sherman and Margaret McLeod of Tullahoma, Tenn. All four are charged with "belittling the character" of Procter & Gamble by making statements or distributing literature which stated that P&G was a symbol of satanism or devil worship. They also encouraged others to stop buying P&G products, the company said.

The rumors typically report that the company's "moons and stars" trademark is a symbol of satanism and devil worship. They also encouraged others to stop buying P&G products, the company said.

101 pints of blood taken Monday

One Hundred, one pints of blood were taken at the Carlisle United Methodist Church Monday, and Rev. David Stancil called the turnout excellent.

"I said if we got 100 pints I would be very happy," Stancil said. "If we got 110 I would jump up and down and if we got 120 I would grow hair."

The goal for the year is 400 pints. "Considering the time of year, the fact that the farmers are busy in the tobacco and our hot weather, we did very well indeed," Stancil said.

The Nicholas County blood donor program had seen a decrease in all donations during the past year, while there had been an increase in donations, according to the Central Kentucky Blood Center.
