The tent caterpillar, familiar to many homeowners, is once again in season in Eastern Kentucky. Dr. Gerald DeMoss, associate professor of biology at Morehead State University, says that chemicals are the only way to control the pests. — Photo submitted.

Be prepared . . . Tent caterpillars return to Kentucky

It's spring again, and they're getting out their tents, tent caterpillars, that is. During their six-to-eight week development their main occupation is eating and growing. It is at this time the caterpillars build their tents for protection from birds. The construction is a community effort. They go on the tree to feed, and then run back to the tent for protection. Dr. DeMoss says, "The bigger the larvae, the bigger the tent." The largest tents are about one foot deep and one foot wide. And, it is the feeding, not the tents themselves that damage the trees. He also says that they are seen throughout North America, but are not prevalent in Eastern Kentucky.

The eastern tent caterpillar is more noticeable," he reported. "It is also probably a little easier to control because we can get to the organisms to spray them." Of the two varieties, Dr. DeMoss says the forest tent caterpillar poses a greater problem economically because it attacks trees suitable for commercial use. In contrast, the eastern tent caterpillar is less threatening to native forest communities, according to Dr. DeMoss. "The only native tree they affect in this area is the wild cherry, which is not an important timber tree," Dr. DeMoss says. However, they also can do considerable damage to apple trees. "They do affect some other ornamentals, such as crab apples," he says, adding that wild cherry or apple trees can attract the insects to an area where they will attack other trees. "Healthy trees are very susceptible to damage," Dr. DeMoss says. Female adults lay their eggs on the end of twigs on host trees, forming a conspicuous gel-like lamp. They remain there for 10 months. All caterpillars break camp.
