Small Business: making America work

Small businesses, including those in our communities, don't get enough credit for their role in keeping America at work. Small Business Week, May 9-15, seems the right time to give them a deserved pat on the back.

Big business gets plenty of media attention about layoffs and hiring plans. Yet big business creates no more than a fourth of our new jobs, routinely. Where do the jobs come from? The day cleaners, the data processing, service, auto repair shop, the high-tech whiz kids, and more than 11 million other small businesses. Small firms generate two of every three new jobs in this country.

To borrow a phrase from the Reagan Administration, small business acts as a kind of safety net for a lot of people who lose their jobs. During the past 18 months, new jobs have been opened their doors at a higher than normal rate, despite all the obstacles. Economists explain that a lot of unemployed people go into business for themselves in a recession—so many that they more than offset the loss of jobs from big firms going bankrupt.

The small business paycheck provides the livelihood for more than 100 million Americans. For making America work, we think small businesses deserve our gratitude.

Agree or not Barkley should have avenue of redress on sex charges

By S.C. Van Cuse
A case now before the Court of Appeals asks for the establishment of some avenue of relief for the wrongfully accused if the Court of Appeals sustains the decision of Franklin County Circuit Judge James Meigs that the Personal Board of Human Rights should have been brought before the Kentucky Commission on Human Rights.

After Barkley accused the Personnel Board ruling, the women were not to be heard. The charges were filed before the State Personnel Board which held public hearings that were covered by the print media as well as television.

Franklin County Judge James Meigs said that the Personnel Board had no jurisdiction of right to try Barkley because he is not under the state merit system. Judge Meigs called the board's action as "an adjudicatory review" which was wholly outside of proper jurisdiction.

The brief said further the Personnel Board's actions are in violation of the limitations of its statutes and regulations of other agencies to suit its own design.

The brief said further the Personnel Board's actions against Barkley are more like an administrative action than a responsible body.

The hearing lasted for several days before the Personnel Board and was held at Educational Television and video by the print media in Kentucky.

Consider the fact that Barkley and his aides will suffer to a considerable extent even if the Court of Appeals rules in their favor. They will be out of attorney and court costs. In addition to the monetary costs, there has been a certain amount of anxiety and worry while awaiting the court decision for more than a year.

The families would be expected not to have appreciated the unfavorable publicity chattering the character of men involved. Wives and family were expected to be in a state of shock, and it is to be proved true.

The only avenue now open to them is to appeal to the Kentucky Supreme Court, and it is to be proved true.

There is no reasonable avenue for recovery of the costs or relieving the burden of embarrassment of being held up by public ridicule.

The Personnel Board is an agency of the state and it would be very difficult to sue the state and it would be very difficult to sue the state and it would be very difficult to sue the state.

Would American Revolution get off ground today? Only on prime time

If you have been a student of Congress, or even served on committees, you probably remember every Soviet treaty decision. It would seem democracy would better before we had it. Imagine trying to start the American Revolution today. It would seem democracy would better before we had it. Imagine trying to start the American Revolution today. It would seem democracy would better before we had it. Imagine trying to start the American Revolution today.

What would be the feasibility of having the Backus Red Sox wear "Down With King George" labels on the backs of their uniforms? If there are no boxes of tea in the Boston harbor, would tea bags do?

Mr. Jefferson's declaration of independence is just one man's opinion. Should it be used in public hearings? Should it be shorter and punchier? Doesn't self-evident sound a bit redundant? Should we append the Preamble to this constitution? It needs more catchy and clever phrases to really catch on.

Five years later, the 27 feasibility studies, 10 people's marches on Washington, nothing said to women and repave the highway by the Russians to sell ramen to England please. Answer going underground with Benedict Arnold.

An anonymous member of the Washington "Resolved, that we have a revolution..."

And American patriots would respond enthusiastically with only one question: "What time does this come on television tonight?"

Advertisers especially have grumpy tales to tell of the difficulty in cracking the language barrier. The makers of Coca-Cola some years ago tried to send a message about their product to the Chinese people, but something definitely was lost in the translation because the sense of the message, so far as the Chinese readers were concerned, was that the drink was made from "female blood lathered with wax."

David Hicks, an Ohio State professor who makes a study of such language difficulties, points out that communication often goes beyond words. By way of example, the attempt of a U.S. distributor to sell his product in Japan through the use of an advertising campaign that featured an ink-blotting fellow, was a terrible failure.

It wasn't that the Japanese beer drinkers didn't appreciate the guy's ads, but they were repelled by the green hat. In Japan, a green hat is said to symbolize a man who has trouble keeping his wife faithful.

The Japanese weren't about to hold a stein to a guy like that.

This young fellow from way back in the bookends was about to get married. Taking an ad in a very rural area he had never left the need for a suit before — a clean pair of buttons and a fresh shirt had always fulfilled the sartorial demands for any affair he attended. But such a limited wardrobe would not do for a wedding. His bride-to-be informed him: "Go buy a suit," she ordered. He.

Hostage rescue

Zbigniew Brzezinski, who in President Carter's national security adviser, has published an insider account of the failed mission to April 19 to rescue the hostages from Iran. It raises the question: Did the wrong man resign after the failure? Cyrus Vance resigned as secretary of state. He had opposed the rescue plan from the first.

Brzezinski, by contrast, presents himself as the prime mover of the plan, proposing it as a "last resort action, to undertake only if the hostages were being killed or were about to be killed," then, later, advocating it as a response to "pressure from the public and from Congress for more direct action against Iran."

There was a certain amount of dissent in this approach, which had considerable attraction for Zbigniew. He even thought of trying to persuade the president to go ahead with the mission with only five helicopters, after three hostages were lost. "There is, alone with the president, able to persuade him to abandon military procedure, to opt for a daring single strike for the big prize, to take the historic chance." President overcame boldness on that occasion and Zbigniew did not make the argument, but the impression remains that patience never had much of a spokesman in the person of Zbigniew Brzezinski.

He says he has never had any political or moral regrets about the rescue mission. There was a good chance of success, he believes, and "not to have tried, while having the capacity to try, would have been shameful and unworthy of America."

If Brzezinski now secretly realizes he was wrong and Vance was right in the conferring advice they gave to Jimmy Carter, there is no hint of that in this new fragment of his memoirs.

News control in South Africa

Compared to the news media in other African states, the press has been relatively independent in South Africa. But it won't remain so unless it's able to resist tough new government attempts to control it. Pretoria is pushing a proposal drawn up by a special commission that would require registration of all journalists and adoption of a statutory "code of conduct" to be administered by a press council with powers to fine or ban reporters who don't comply.

For years, successive governments in South Africa have tried to harness the newspapers but never before by such coercive measures. Even the milder threats, however, worked to induce the press to edge toward self-censorship in a strategy that has come to be known in South African press circles as "preference politics" — I will not push if you jump.

The latest effort by Pretoria suggests the government is playing the same game, and tougher. But this time it may in fact have gone too far. There are encouraging signs that the NPU intends to make a stand that it will not jump before it is pushed. As one NPU official put it: "Let the government be seen doing its own dirty work." Since a muzzled press in South Africa also means a diminished flow of news to the outside world, there should be considerable attention to this struggle on the part of the media everywhere.

Just drawing attention, however, will not be enough. There should be protests by governments throughout the free world, and particularly by a Reagan administration which has sought to enhance American influence by "soft" measures concerning South Africa's racist policies. The press issue would be a significant test of that country's press council. Then, when government threats persisted, the council was given even more teeth. Even so, that step was not nearly as drastic as the controls now sought by the government.

The latest effort by Pretoria suggests the

The welfare state is creeping up on us. It is creating a new generation of Americans who do not have the work ethic as a basic life principle. You cannot blame people in their working years who know no other way to live than to collect a check on the last day of the month. In many parts of Kentucky for many years there has been no other way to get by but to rely on the federal and state governments.

What is happening is that those who have grown up on the federal and state dole in the 1930's and 1940's have become the norm. And they have had children who have grown up on the dole.

On top of that, the incentive to have children is built into the system, because the amount of the benefits rises, depending on how many children the family has. So when large families should have been avoided because of hard economic times, they were actually encouraged by federal and state programs.

So the system is working, but it's not working. The short term effects are that some new families have been helped. The long term effect is that a new generation of Americans is born and growing by the minute. This welfare generation is in its future and growing consequences for us in the future and very way of life is at stake. What happens to the child who is believed to be a child who will get ahead on the federal and state dole? What happens to the child who is believed to be a child who will get ahead on the federal and state dole? What happens to the child who is believed to be a child who will get ahead on the federal and state dole?

INSPECTION PERIOD FOR THE PROPERTY TAX ASSESSMENT ROLL

The Nicholas County property tax roll will be opened for inspection from May 24 through June 7, 1982. Under the supervision of the property valuation administrator or one of the deputies, any property owner may inspect the tax roll.

This is the January 1, 1982 assessment on which state, county, and school taxes for 1982 will be due.

The tax roll is in the office of the property valuation administrator in the county courthouse and may be inspected between the hours 9:00 and 12:00 and 1:00 and 4:00 weekdays and 9:00 and 12:00 Saturdays.

Any person who wishes to appeal an assessment must file a written letter or petition with the county clerk within the above period of time. This letter or petition must state the reasons for appeal, identify the property in question, and state the taxpayer's estimate of actual fair cash value. (KRS 133.120)
