Fall webworms cause unsightly nests

Motivator traveling Kentucky's highways may notice that many of the trees along the right-of-way are infested with rather large, unsightly nests. This is the work of fall webworms.

According to Dr. R.A. Schelber, Extension entomologist with the University of Kentucky College of Agriculture, fall webworms may be confused with Eastern tent caterpillars which make their nests in the crotches of trees.

"Fall webworm infestations appear one year after you may be one of the main street factors that cause the unsightly growth of forest and pasture trees," Schelber said.

"Because most of the infested trees occur in highway right-of-way, pastures or forests and not in home landscapes, not much effort is made in controlling the pest," noted Schelber.

Web that are far enough out can be pruned out when the nests are small. If the web is too high for pruning, Schelber suggests using insecticidal sprays, treating only the web and foliage around the web.
