Kentucky's Department of Public Advocacy provides legal assistance to...

In legal matters, Giddens did legal research and eventually appeared in court...

This precedent-setting case, known as Giddens v. Weinright, opened the public defenders office which are so badly needed today.

Jack Farley, the public advocate who heads the state office, said that the program handles about 90,000 cases each year.

And their service, according to Public Protection and Regulation Cabinet Secretary Neil Welch is extremely valuable.

Public Advocacy encourages a fair judicial system by providing legal representation to those who need it.

'82 - Stormy year for burley tobacco

The recent high-priced tobacco market and the booming big crop now being marketed may not show its full effect until the year 1983 has revolutionized things for burley growers and their trade.

Peace might have been expected after this, but controversy continued through the spring and summer. It was a year of dramatic changes have taken place, more so than in any year since price supports and production control went into effect in 1970.

It was a year of dramatic changes in the burley tobacco industry. The year has been a year of dramatic changes in the burley tobacco industry.

Hunting and fishing seasons open for cold weather enthusiasts

Although Kentucky's squirrel and deer hunting seasons closed Dec. 31, there still is a couple of months' worth of hunting for rabbits and grouse, as well as almost a month until the waterfowl season closes after Jan. 31.

Small game seasons will extend through Feb. 28 this year, and even if most birds or rabbit hunters can't wait for the season long before that, there is a small group of dedicated bird and mammal hunters who will be out there until the last day of the season.

These hunters hunt for a variety of reasons. Perhaps they are successful because they do permit and learn a little more about the game they're hunting than the "fair weather" hunter who hangs in after the Christmas holidays.
