County fires are reported

County Fire Chief Woody Wilson reports a call at 8:45 p.m. Jan. 7 to the tenant home of Glenn Barber, 11 miles east of Carlisle on the Moorefield Road, on the Lander Crockett farm. The fire was caused from an overheated stove in a front room. Damage was contained to the room with the stove burning a hole in the floor, and paint damage to the furniture. No one was home at the time of the fire.

On Jan. 10 at 12:30 a.m., a house rented to Leonard Morris Jr. located on the Ben Glass property, was completely destroyed by fire. The house was empty as Mr. Morris had not moved in yet. The house is located 4¼ miles east of Carlisle on U.S. Highway 68.

Consumer Alert

"Supermarket Specials"

Newspapers across the commonwealth carry numerous advertisements proclaiming special savings on items at local food stores. These advertised specials can mean real bargains for the smart shopper who compares the advertisements and shops where the lowest prices are advertised. But, what if an advertised item is sold out when the shopper arrives or is almost impossible to locate in the store?

According to Attorney General Steven L. Beshear, this situation may constitute an unlawful act by the grocer. Rules of the Federal Trade Commission, reinforced by Kentucky's Consumer Protection Act, provide guidelines for the use of advertised specials by food retailers. Some special savings are often used as "bait advertising" to get you into the store so that a more expensive sale can be made. Although "bait advertising" is unlawful in Kentucky, some stores have a habit of always being "sold out" of advertised specials. This is in violation of Federal Trade Commission regulations regarding retail practices, as well as the Kentucky Consumer Protection Act. The four conditions of an advertised special are:

— The grocer must have in stock an amount of the advertised item sufficient to meet the expected demand.

— The advertised item must be conspicuously displayed in the store for easy location by the shoppers.

— The advertised item must, for the period of the sale, be priced at or below the advertised sale price.

— The advertisement must clearly state any specific restriction on, limitation of, or exceptions to the availability of the advertised item. These include limits on the quantity of the item each shopper may purchase, as well as the minimum amount of total purchase necessary to take advantage of the special. If the advertisement is made by a food chain, it must indicate which of the chain's stores, if any, are not participating in the special.

"If the supermarket has sold out of the advertised special, ask for a raincheck," says Beshear. "This is a ticket or credit allowing you to purchase the item at a later date at the presently advertised special price. While this policy may be fair, the Federal Trade Commission rule says that a raincheck in itself is not enough to comply with the law: You have a right to the product at the advertised price the first time you go to the store."

Getting the most for food dollars is easy if you make wise use of advertised specials. Compare the advertised prices and read the advertisement fully. Don't be a victim of "bait advertising."

If you have trouble locating a sale item, do not hesitate to ask the store manager to assist you. If an advertised item is not available at the supermarket, check the ad to make sure there are grounds for a complaint. If there is a complaint to the store manager. If you do not get results, contact the office of the Attorney General, Consumer Protection Division, 209 St. Clair Street, Frankfort, Ky. 40601-1875. Or you may call the toll-free Consumer Hotline at 1-800-432-9257.

Ford's Footnotes

by Senator Ed Ford

A new chapter of legislative history was written when I joined my colleagues in the Senate on Jan. 4, 1983 for a first-ever organizational session.

The session is part of a constitutional amendment approved in 1979 allowing the brief odd-year meet. A maximum of 10 days was set aside for the assembly to select new leaders, organize committees and appoint committee chairmen, provide orientation for new members, and conduct other non-lawmaking business of the Legislature.

This session was different from future sessions, because the amendment also changed the date of election years and there were no new members to swear in at this time. Thus we only needed three days to take care of our business.

The first two days of the session were overshadowed by questions concerning the special income-tax-reform session that Gov. John Y. Brown Jr. called for Monday, Jan. 10, but later postponed. Many of us questioned whether the governor had constitutional authority to delay a special session once he had issued the formal call. There is no legal precedent and the constitution is not specific on the matter. One senator requested an attorney general's opinion, but even its release on Wednesday failed to clear things up.

In the interest of our constituents, we decided to cut our organizational session short by one and one half days. A fourth day to convene and immediately adjourn a special session, thereby disposing of the legal requirement to meet. This spawned another controversy — whether or not we could move the convening date back. I expect a lawsuit over this to be filed in the future. While I believe in following the letter of the law, the law in this instance is not clear, and I do know that our move saved the taxpayers approximately $31,000 — the amount it could cost for the General Assembly to meet on Jan. 10.

Many of us questioned whether or not a special session on tax reform was even necessary. We hope the governor will give our appropriations and revenue committee time to study any proposals before calling us into extraordinary session again.

Before the organizational session adjourned on Jan. 6, the Senate elected new leadership. There were no changes on the Democratic side, but the Republican slate was reshuffled.

We also approved committee membership. There were no changes made in the standing-committee rosters for the Senate, and those members will continue to serve on the merged panels with the House for the rest of the interim.

House Week in Review

by Representative Adrian Arnold

The General Assembly's first-ever organizational session is now history — and while much of the drama of a regular session was missing when we met in early January, I think history will judge our three-day session a milestone in the march for legislative independence.

There was some suspense during the week, mostly concerning a proposed special session to consider overhauling the state's income-tax structure. Gov. John Y. Brown Jr. had originally called such a session for Jan. 10 — on the heels of the organizational session — but backed off when problems surfaced with his tax plan. Some lawmakers questioned whether Brown had the constitutional authority to postpone a special session once it was formally called. The attorney general was consulted, but even his opinion failed to settle the controversy.

Finally, we decided to just cut our organizational session short by one day, using the fourth day (Friday, Jan. 7) to convene and then immediately adjourn the special session. By doing this on Friday — instead of coming back Monday as the session call had specified — we saved the taxpayers many thousands of dollars.

The confusion and uncertainty surrounding the on-again, off-again session prompted us to approve a motion asking the governor to give us plenty of advance, written notice of his intention to call a special session. And that's a possibility, because the administration has indicated it may come back in either March or June with a revised tax-reform proposal.

The brief organizational session — which ran from Jan. 4 through Jan. 6 — represented one of the major reforms approved by voters in a 1979 constitutional amendment.

Among other things, the amendment allows the Legislature to meet for a maximum of 10 days in odd-numbered years to elect leadership, appoint committees and committee chairmen, and basically clear away all the non-lawmaking business of the Legislature — thus freeing up the regular session (in even-numbered years) for more substantive work.

An ongoing changeover in legislative election years — another feature of the constitutional amendment — meant there were no new members to swear in and provide orientation for this year. But future organizational sessions will feature a "freshman class" of legislators getting their first taste of the lawmaking process.

Library conducts label drive

The staff at the Nicholas County Public Library is currently conducting a label collection drive that promises to deliver valuable educational equipment. As part of a program called Labels for Education, Campbell Soup Company is offering free equipment to libraries in exchange for labels from their products.

According to Jorita Anderson, librarian, they redeem the labels for free audio/visual equipment, reference books and teaching aids. We hope to collect 5,000 labels before the drive ends Feb. 12.

"We know we have many friends in the community who will want to help," said Mrs. Anderson. "They may do so by saving the Campbell's labels and turning them in at the local library."

Contact Mrs. Anderson at the library, 289-5095, for information on acceptable labels.
